WISE, John, aéronaut, b. in Lancaster, Pa., 24 Feb., 1808; d. in Lake Michigan, 28 or 29 Sept., 1879. His first ascension from Philadelphia, Pa., on 2 May, 1835, was short and uneventful. During his next, on 4 July, 1835, from Lebanon, Pa., he attempted to open the valve on the top of the balloon, but lost control, and it burst, compelling him to descend. On 1 Oct., 1835, he attempted an ascension from Lancaster, Pa., but was thrown from the car and became unconscious while the balloon ascended alone, and on 7 May, 1836, he ascended again from Lancaster, and landed in Harford county, Md., about seventy-five miles distant. While he was emptying the car of its cargo an explosion of the gas occurred, burning the aéronaut severely. He made a voyage from Philadelphia, Pa., on 18 Sept., 1837, alighting in Delaware river, where he was rescued. On this trip he set loose two parachutes for the purpose of demonstrating the superiority of the inverted parachute. In October, 1837, he ascended again from Philadelphia, and alighted in New Jersey, forty miles from his starting-point. He left Easton, Pa., 11 Aug., 1838, and when he had reached the height of 13,000 feet his balloon burst, and in less than ten seconds all the gas had escaped. The balloon descended rapidly with an oscillating motion, and, on reaching the earth, rebounded, throwing Mr. Wise ten feet from the car. He next advertised that on 1 Oct., 1838, he would ascend and in the air would convert his balloon into a parachute, which feat he successfully accomplished. On 4 July, 1840, he entered into competition with William Paullin for a record of the highest and longest balloon ascension, but was defeated. In June, 1843, he announced his intention of crossing the Atlantic in the summer of 1844, advancing the theory that there was a constant air-current from west to east 12,000 feet above the ocean; but he failed to secure an appropriation from congress for the purpose, and was compelled to abandon the project. In August, 1846, during an ascension from West Chester, Pa., he entered a thunder-cloud, and, on descending, his car was struck by lightning, but he escaped. During an ascent, on 15 Aug., 1851, from Zanesville, Ohio, he made experiments on the action of falling bodies, and found that they all spin upon their axes. A light, empty pint-bottle fell in a large spiral, giving out a musical sound in its descent, and turning slowly on an axis as it came down. On 5 Sept., 1851, he ascended from Columbus, Ohio, and found himself entering a stratum, 10,000 feet in height, that was highly electrical and agitated by "convulsionary air-wheels." All parts of the balloon-rigging acquired musical properties, the various cords giving forth sounds similar to those of a stringed instrument. At sunset he saw the clouds tinted with the colors of the rainbow, and, although more than a mile high, heard the voices of persons below in conversation. This voyage was beneficial to his health, which had been much impaired. In 1851 he petitioned congress for an appropriation of $20,000 for the purpose of constructing a large air-ship with which to demonstrate the possibility of destroying any fleet, fort, or army by means of explosive missiles thrown from the car, and also the possibility of crossing the ocean. The petition was referred to the naval committee and never reported on. Thereafter he continued to make occasional ascensions until 1859, when they numbered about 230. In that year, with John La Mountain and others, he made the celebrated voyage from St. Louis to Jefferson county, N. Y., a description of which is given in the article LA MOUNTAIN. From September, 1871, till July, 1872, he was librarian of the Franklin institute. He then revived his project of crossing the Atlantic, and made efforts to raise funds for a balloon and equipment, but without success until the enterprise was taken up by the "Daily Graphic," of New York city. (See DONALDSON, WASHINGTON H.) Soon after this failure he removed to Louisiana, Mo., intending to devote the remainder of his life to farming; but he was unable to resist the fascination of ballooning, and announced an ascension from St. Louis, Mo., 28 Sept., 1879. With several companions, in a new balloon named the "Pathfinder," he set out at the appointed time, intending to stay in the air as long as he could. The balloon moved in a northeasterly direction, and was last seen at Carlinville, Ill. From that time no tidings were ever received from the aéronauts, but several weeks later the body of one of the party was washed ashore on Lake Michigan. It is supposed that they perished during one of the sudden tempests of that region, and, like Donaldson and others, were drowned in the waters of the great lake. Mr. Wise published a "System of Aéronautics" (Philadelphia, 1850).

WISNER, Benjamin Blydenburg, clergyman, b. in Goshen, Orange co., N. Y., 19 Sept., 1794; d. in Boston, Mass., 9 Feb., 1835. His father was one of the first settlers in Goshen. Benjamin was graduated at Union in 1813 and at Princeton theological seminary in 1820, and in the interval was principal of the academy in Johnstown, N. Y., also studying law. In 1821-'32 he was pastor of the Old South church, Boston, Mass. He then resigned on account of failing health, and became secretary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. In that capacity he did good service in visiting various parts of the country and in forming missionary associations. Union gave him the degree of D. D. in 1828. His publications include single sermons and memoirs; "History of the Old South Church" (Boston, 1830); and "Moral Condition and Prospects of the Heathen" (1833). See "Memorial Volume of the First Fifty Years of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions," by Rufus Anderson, D. D. (1862).

WISNER, Henry, patriot, b. in Goshen, Orange co., N. Y., about 1725; d. there in 1790.

He was the grandson of a Swiss soldier who settled in Orange county in 1715. Henry was appointed in 1768 one of the assistant justices of the court of common pleas, and represented Orange county in the New York general assembly in 1759-'69. He strenuously espoused the side of colonial rights against the pretensions of the British parliament, and was a member of the Continental congress of 1774, and of the 2d Continental congress, which adopted the Declaration of Independence. For that measure Wisner voted, and he was the only New York delegate who acquired that honor, but before the Declaration was engrossed on parchment and ready for signing, he went to New York to attend the Provincial congress, of which he had been elected a member. He studied the art of making gunpowder and erected three powder-mills in the neighborhood of Goshen, from which large quantities of powder were supplied to the Revolutionary army. He was otherwise of practical service to the patriot cause by having spears and gun-flints made and by repairing the roads in Orange county, thus facilitating the transportation of provisions and military material to the American troops. He also, at his own expense, erected works and mounted cannon on the banks of Hudson river, which greatly impeded British vessels in their passage of the Highlands. He was one of the committee that framed the first constitution of New York in 1777, state senator in 1777-'82, and a member of the New York convention of 1788, which ratified the U. S. constitution. On that occasion he voted in the negative, fearing, in common with other stanch patriots, that a strong Federal government would overpower state and individual rights. In person Wisner was tall, with pleasing manners, and a frame that was vigorous even in old age. He possessed a strong intellect and an energetic character. See "A Memorial of Henry Wisner," by Franklin Burdge (New York, 1878).

WISNER, Moses, lawyer, b. in Aurelius, N. Y., in 1818; d. in Lexington, Ky., 5 Jan., 1863. He was carefully educated, removed to Michigan in 1839, studied law, and was admitted to the bar at Pontiac in 1842. He became prosecuting attorney for Lapeer county in 1843, and was governor of Michigan in 1849-'61. In 1862 he entered the National army as colonel of the 22d Michigan regiment, but died on his way to the seat of war.

WISNER, William, clergyman, b. in Warwick, N. Y., in 1782; d. in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, 7 Jan., 1871. He adopted the profession of law, and practised in Orange county, N. Y., for several years, but relinquished that profession to become a clergyman. He studied theology at Princeton seminary, was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Ithaca for a short time, and in 1831 took charge of the Brick church, Rochester, N. Y., where he remained for several years. He removed to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in 1870. Delaware college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1842. His publications include "Incidents in the Life of a Pastor" (New York, 1851), and "Elements of Civil Liberty, or the Way to maintain Free Institutions" (1853).—His son, William Carpenter, clergyman, b. in Elmira, N. Y., 7 Dec., 1808; d. in Lockport, N. Y., 14 July, 1880, was graduated at Union in 1830, studied theology with private instructors, and was pastor of Presbyterian churches in New York and Missouri from 1832 till 1836, when he became pastor in Lockport, N. Y., holding charges there from 1837 till 1876. Union college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1851. Dr. Wisner was known throughout the Presbyterian church not only for solid learning, but for his inexhaustible humor. He left his large private library to Auburn theological seminary, of which he was a trustee in 1863-'76. He was moderator of the general assembly in 1855. He published several sermons and "Prelacy and Parity" (New York, 1844).

WISSER, John Philip, soldier, b. in St. Louis, Mo., 19 July, 1852. He was graduated at the Central high-school of St. Louis in 1870, and at the U. S. military academy in 1874. Receiving an assignment to the 1st artillery, he served on garrison duty in Florida and Massachusetts until May, 1876, when he was ordered to the U. S. artillery-school at Fort Monroe. Since 1878 he has been connected almost continuously with the academic staff of instructors at the U. S. military academy, chiefly in the department of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology. On 13 Jan., 1880, he was promoted 1st lieutenant, and during 1884 he studied at the Freiberg, Saxony, school of mines, and at the agricultural experiment station at Wiesbaden. He was requested to investigate and report upon the system of instruction at the military schools of England, France, Germany, and Austria, and to attend and report upon the manœuvres of the 17th corps of the French army in 1884. Lieut. Wisser was aide-de-camp to Gen. John Gibbon during the Chinese troubles in Washington territory in 1886, but in August of that year he returned to the U. S. military academy. He is a member of the Chemical society of Berlin and of the American association for the advancement of science. His publications include "Chemical Manipulations" (Fort Monroe, 1883); "Short Historical Sketch of Gunpowder" (New York, 1883); "Compressed Gun-Cotton for Military Use" (1886); "Report on the Manœuvres of the 17th Corps of the Army of France" (Vancouver Barracks, W. T., 1886); "Practical Instruction in Minor Tactics and Strategy" (New York, 1888); and "Report on the Military Schools of Europe: I., Austria" (1889).

WISSLER, Jacques, engraver, b. in Strasburg, Germany, in 1803; d. in Camden, N. J., 25 Nov., 1887. He was educated in Paris, France, came to this country in 1849, and was employed in a lithographing firm. Before the civil war his employer sent him to Richmond, Va., and after the firing on Fort Sumter he was detained by the Confederate authorities and assigned to the task of engraving its paper currency and bonds. Mr. Wissler acquired a fortune in this employment, but his loyalty to the U. S. government caused the confiscation of his estate before the close of the war. He then removed to Macon, Miss., and finally settled in Camden, N. J., where he acquired the reputation of being among the most skilled engravers in this country. He was also successful in portrait-painting in crayons and oils.

WISTAR, Richard, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 20 July, 1756; d. there, 6 June, 1821. He was the grandson of Caspar Wistar, who came to this country from Germany in 1717 and established near Salem, N. J., what is believed to have been the first glass-factory in the colonies, in the management of which his son was also associated. In early life Richard turned his attention to commerce, in which he was eminently successful. He built a large four-storied store in 1790, where he conducted an iron and hardware business, and with the profits of this undertaking purchased lands and houses in the vicinity of Philadelphia, which became exceedingly valuable. During the Revolutionary war he advocated the defence of his property by arms, which resulted in his being disowned by the Society of Friends. He was an inspector of prisons, and was one of the early friends and supporters of the Philadelphia library company and the Pennsylvania hospital.—His brother, Caspar, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 Sept., 1761; d. there, 22 Jan., 1818, was educated at the Friends' school in his native city, where he received a thorough classical training. His interest in medicine began while he was aiding in the care of the wounded after the battle of Germantown, and he made his first studies under the direction of Dr. John Redman. He attended lectures at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, and received the degree of bachelor of medicine in 1782. After spending a year in England, he went to Edinburgh, where, in 1786, he received his doctorate. While in Scotland he was, for two successive years, president of the Royal medical society of Edinburgh, and also president of a society for the further investigation of natural history. He returned to this country in January, 1787, and entered on the practice of his profession in Philadelphia, where he was at once appointed one of the physicians to the Philadelphia dispensary. He was professor of chemistry and the institutes of medicine in the College of Philadelphia from 1789 till 1792, when the faculty of that institution united with the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, of which he was adjunct professor of anatomy, midwifery, and surgery until 1803. In that year, on the death of his associate, Dr. William Shippen, Jr., he was given the chair of anatomy, which he retained until his death. His fame attracted students to his lectures, and he was largely the means of establishing the reputation of the school. Meanwhile he was chosen physician to the Pennsylvania hospital, where he remained until 1810. His ability as an anatomist was increased by his description of the posterior portion of the ethmoid bone with the triangular bones attached, which received universal recognition as an original treatment of the subject. It was his habit to throw open his house once every week in the winter, and at these gatherings students, citizens, scientists, and travellers met and discussed subjects of interest. These assemblies, celebrated in the annals of Philadelphia under the title of Wistar parties, were continued long after his death by other residents of that city. The College of physicians elected him a fellow in 1787, and he was appointed one of its censors in 1794, which place he retained until his death. He was elected a member of the American philosophical society in 1787, was chosen its vice-president in 1795, and on the resignation of Thomas Jefferson, in 1815, succeeded to the highest office, which he filled during the remainder of his life. On the death of Dr. Benjamin Rush, Dr. Wistar succeeded to the presidency of the Society for the abolition of slavery. The well-known climbing-shrub, wistaria, which grows wild in the western and southern states, was named in his honor. Dr. Wistar contributed papers to the "Transactions of the College of Physicians" and to the "Transactions of the American Philosophical Society," and was the author of "A System of Anatomy, for the Use of Students of Medicine" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1814, originally published in parts).—His son, Isaac Jones, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Nov., 1827, was educated at Haverford college, Pa., adopted the profession of law, and practised in Philadelphia. He entered the National army in 1861, as a captain in a regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers, and served in Maryland and Virginia, his commission as brigadier-general of volunteers, dated 29 Nov., 1862, being granted for services at Antietam. After the war he resumed practice, and is now president of a canal company and several coal companies in Pennsylvania.

WISTER, Annis Lee, translator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Oct., 1830. She is the daughter of the Rev. William H. Furness, and married, in 1854, Dr. Caspar Wister (a descendant of Caspar Wistar, who came to this country in 1717), who was born in 1817, and died 20 Dec., 1888. Her education was received chiefly at home under the care of her father, and she early began to translate stories from the German. Subsequently she translated and adapted various novels, including those of Eugenie Marlitt, Wilhelmine von Hillern, Friedrich W. Hackländer, Fanny Lewald, and others, numbering in all more than thirty volumes (Philadelphia, 1864 et seq.), among which are "The Old Mam'selle's Secret," "Gold Elsie," "The Second Wife," "Violetta," and "The Owl's Nest." A uniform set of her German translations has been issued in thirty volumes (1888). She has also published, with Dr. Frederic H. Hedge, "Metrical Translations and Poems" (Boston, 1888).

WISWALL, Ichabod, clergyman, b. in England in 1638; d. in Duxbury, Mass., 23 July, 1700. He emigrated to this country in his youth, studied at Harvard for three years without being graduated, was ordained to the ministry, and from 1676 until his death was pastor of the church in Duxbury, Mass. He taught for many years, and was an agent of the colony in 1689 in its efforts to prevent the union of Plymouth colony to New York or Massachusetts, visiting England for this purpose, but was defeated by Increase Mather, the representative of Massachusetts, who desired the union. Wiswall published a poem on the comet of 1680 (London, 1680).

WITHERELL, James, statesman, b. in Mansfield, Mass., 16 June, 1759; d. in Detroit, Mich., 9 Jan., 1838. He served in the Revolutionary army as a member of the 11th Massachusetts regiment from the beginning of the war till 1783, when he was mustered out of service, after participating in the principal battles in New York and New Jersey, and being severely wounded at White Plains. He then studied medicine in his native state, was licensed to practise in 1788, and removed to Vermont, where he adopted the profession of law. He served in the legislature in 1798-1803, was a judge of Rutland county for the next two years, state councillor in 1803-'7, and a member of congress from October, 1807, till May, 1808, when he resigned to become U. S. judge for the territory of Michigan. He resigned that post in 1828, and was appointed secretary of the territory by President John Quincy Adams. He was active in the management of the municipal and educational affairs of Detroit, and left a valuable collection of papers on the history of that city and the state of Michigan.—His son, Benjamin Franklin Hawkins, jurist, b. in Fair Haven, Vt., 4 Aug., 1797; d. in Detroit, Mich., 26 June, 1867, was educated in a private school in Troy, N. Y., accompanied his father to Michigan, and studied law. He was admitted to the bar of Detroit in 1819, was prosecuting attorney and probate judge of Wayne county, and in 1843 district judge of the criminal court of Wayne, Washtenaw, and Jackson counties. He became historiographer of Detroit in 1855, and from 1857 until his death was circuit judge of Wayne county. He was appointed a regent of the State university in 1848, served several terms in the legislature, was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1850, and president of the Michigan historical society for many years.

WITHERS, Frederick Clarke, architect, b. in Shepton Mallet, Somersetshire, England, 4 Feb., 1828. He was educated in King Edward's school in Sherborne, Dorsetshire, and then devoted himself to the study of architecture. Mr. Withers early came to this country and established for himself a high reputation for his designs of churches. Among these are St. Luke's, Matteawan, N. Y.; the 1st Presbyterian, Newburg, N. Y.; St. Thomas's, Hanover, N. H.; the Church of the Advent, Louisville, Ky.; St. Luke's, Altoona, Pa.; and Calvary, Summit, N. J. Of other buildings, the Hudson river state hospital for the insane at Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; and the buildings of the Columbia institution for deaf and dumb at Washington, D. C., are from his plans. The Jefferson market court-house and prison in New York, designed in the Italian Gothic style, is the only public building where that style has been introduced, and ranks as one of the best pieces of architectural designing in that city. He also designed and had charge of the erection of the altar and reredos in Trinity church, New York city, in honor of William B. Astor. This memorial, carved in Caen stone, occupies nearly the entire width of the chancel, and is about twenty feet high. The altar, of white marble, is eleven feet long, and is divided into panels, in the central one of which is a Maltese cross in mosaic set with cameos, on which are cut the symbols of the evangelists. In beauty of design and delicacy of carving this reredos is among the best works of its character on the American continent. (See illustration.) During 1861-'2 Mr. Withers served as an officer in the New York volunteer engineers, and he has published "Church Architecture" (New York, 1873).

WITHERS, Jones Mitchell, soldier, b. in Madison county, Wis., 12 Jan., 1814. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1835, and resigned in the same year, but during the Creek disturbances in 1836 commanded the Alabama volunteers. He subsequently studied law in Tuscaloosa, Ala., became private secretary to Gov. Clement C. Clay, and was admitted to the bar in 1838. He settled in Mobile as a lawyer and commission merchant in 1841. He was in the legislature in 1855, mayor of Mobile in 1856-'61, and at the beginning of the civil war entered the Confederate army as colonel of the 3d Alabama infantry. He became brigadier-general in July, 1861, commanding the defences of Mobile, major-general early in 1862, commanded a division at Shiloh, and participated in the battle of Stone River, 31 Dec., 1862. He was subsequently in charge of a department, with headquarters at Montgomery, Ala. After the war he returned to Mobile, and edited the "Tribune" in that city.

WITHERS, Robert Enoch, senator, b. in Campbell county, Va., 18 Sept., 1821. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Virginia in 1840, and practised his profession in his native county for fifteen years, afterward removing to Danville, Va. Early in 1861 he became colonel of the 18th Virginia regiment, and with that command he participated in all the battles of the Army of Northern Virginia from Bull Run to Gaines's Mills, where he was severely wounded. Being incapacitated for further field duty, he was then assigned to the charge of the prisons and hospitals in Danville, Va., which post he held till the close of the civil war. He edited the "Lynchburg News" in 1866-'8, and subsequently the "Richmond Enquirer," and was nominated for governor by the Democratic party in 1868, but withdrew in favor of Gilbert C. Walker, Conservative. He was a presidential elector in 1873, became lieutenant-governor, 1 Jan., 1874, and on the 13th of the same month was chosen U. S. senator as a Democrat, succeeding John F. Lewis, Republican, and serving one term. Since 1885 he has been U. S. consul at Hong Kong, China.

WITHERSPOON, John, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Gifford, Haddingtonshire, Scotland, 5 Feb., 1722; d. near Princeton, N. J., 15 Sept., 1794. Through his mother he was descended from John Knox. His father, James Witherspoon, was minister of the parish of Yester, which included the village of Gifford. The son was graduated at Edinburgh university in 1742, and in 1745 was ordained minister of the parish of Beith. While looking at the battle of Falkirk he was made a prisoner, and confined for two weeks, to the permanent injury of his health. He gained a wide reputation, first by a satirical essay on ecclesiastical abuses, and afterward by a disquisition on the Calvinistic doctrine of justification by faith, and was installed pastor at Paisley on 16 Jan., 1757, and in the course of a year was chosen moderator of the synod of Glasgow and Ayr. The University of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of D. D. in 1764. He declined the presidency of Princeton college in 1766, but accepted a second invitation, and was inaugurated on 17 Aug., 1768. He brought with him 300 valuable volumes as a gift to the college, while his friends in Scotland and England gave many more. Finding the treasury empty, he made a tour in New England, obtaining subscriptions in Boston and other towns, secured aid also from South Carolina, Virginia, and other colonies, and issued "An Address to the Inhabitants of Jamaica and other West India Islands on Behalf of the College of New Jersey." His special department of instruction was that of divinity, and during the entire period of his presidency he officiated as pastor of the church in Princeton. He was the first teacher in this country of the system of metaphysics that was contemporaneously expounded in Scotland by Thomas Reid. He also enlarged the course of philosophy so as to include political science and international law, and promoted the study of mathematics. The college received a great expansion through his administrative ability and the introduction of progressive educational methods. Besides other improvements in the system of teaching, he introduced the lecture method, and gave lectures himself on rhetoric, moral philosophy, history, and theology. In 1772 he instituted a class in Hebrew, and he also introduced the study of the French language. He was a leader of the Presbyterians of the country in embracing the side of the patriots in the difficulties with the British crown, identifying himself with the colonial contention from his landing in America, and by his influence and example doing much to attach the Scotch and Scotch-Irish population to the patriot cause. When the preparations for a general congress were in progress he met the New Jersey committee at New Brunswick to urge resistance to the tea tax, and was accounted "as high a son of liberty as any man in America." On 17 May, 1776, which was appointed by congress as a day of fasting, he delivered a sermon on "The Dominion of Providence over the Passions of Men," which was published and dedicated to John Hancock, and reprinted in Glasgow with notes denouncing the author as a rebel and a traitor. The people of New Jersey elected him to the convention that framed the state constitution, and he surprised his fellow-members with his knowledge of law. On 22 June, after taking part, as a member of the Provincial congress, in the overthrow of the authority of the royal governor, William Franklin, he was elected to the Continental congress. He was impatient of delay in passing the Declaration of Independence, declaring that "he that will not respond to its accents, and strain every nerve to carry into effect its provisions, is unworthy the name of freeman," and protesting for himself that "although these gray hairs must soon descend into the sepulchre, I would infinitely rather that they should descend thither by the hand of the public executioner than desert at this crisis the sacred cause of my country." He was a member of the secret committee of congress whose labors were of supreme importance in the prosecution of the war. In November, 1776, he was appointed on a committee with two others to visit Gen. Washington and confer with him on the military crisis, and in December, when congress had been driven from Philadelphia to Baltimore, he made one of a committee, the other members being Richard Henry Lee and John Adams, which issued a stirring appeal to the people. He was also a member of the board of war, and in 1778 was made a member of the committee on the finances. In the following year he distinguished himself as a member of the committee to procure supplies for the famishing army. He also acted in that year on the committee to conduct negotiations with the people of Vermont, who were determined to organize a new state on the New Hampshire grants. In 1779 he resigned his seat in congress on account of the expense that was incident to the place, and with the desire to devote his attention to a revival in the college; but he was persuaded to return in 1780. Many of the state papers on the emission of a paper currency, the mode of supplying the army by commission, and other important subjects were from his pen, and some of the chief measures of congress were initiated by him. Retiring from congress in 1783, he visited England with Joseph Reed, intending to appeal to the people of Great Britain and the continent for contributions to the treasury of Princeton college; but he found the British so embittered toward the people of this country that he refrained from presenting his object to the public. He did not resume the work of teaching after the war, but occupied himself with the administrative affairs of the college and with the cultivation of a farm near Princeton till the close of his life. For two years before his death he was blind. The earliest publication of Dr. Witherspoon was his "Ecclesiastical Characteristics, or the Arcana of Church Policy; being an Humble Attempt to open up the Mystery of Moderation," first issued without his name (Glasgow, 1753), but afterward avowed in "A Serious Apology for the 'Characteristics.'" His "Essay on the Connection between the Doctrine of Justification by the Imputed Righteousness of Christ and Holiness of Life" (Edinburgh, 1856) was often republished. The publication by the Rev. John Home of the tragedy of "Douglas" drew from him a "Serious Inquiry into the Nature and Effects of the Stage" (Glasgow, 1757). A sermon entitled "Seasonable Advice to Young Persons" (Paisley, 1762), denouncing some young men for mocking the sacrament, subjected him to a heavy fine for libel. The first collection of his writings, which bore the title of "Essays on Important Subjects, with Ecclesiastical Characteristics" (3 vols., London, 1764), included an "Essay on Regeneration," which was also published separately. "Sermons on Practical Subjects" (Glasgow, 1768) and "Practical Discourses on Leading Truths of the Gospel" (1768) contained nine and fourteen homilies, respectively. After coming to this country he published single sermons; lectures on philosophy, eloquence, divinity, and education; an "Essay on Money," "Letters on Marriage," philological papers in "The Druid," and political essays, one of which, entitled "Considerations on the Nature and Extent of the Legislative Authority of the British Parliament" (Philadelphia, 1774), was attributed to Benjamin Franklin. After his death appeared a volume containing "Sermons on Various Subjects," and numerous controversial tracts, one of which was the "History of a Corporation of Servants," satirizing the Church of England, which was written before he left Scotland. A collected edition of his "Works," with his funeral sermon by Rev. Dr. John Rodgers, and a memoir of his life by Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Smith, was edited by the Rev. Dr. Ashbel Green (4 vols., New York, 1800-'1; 9 vols., Edinburgh, 1804). The "Life" had already appeared by itself (New York, 1795), and was reprinted in an edition of his "Select Works" (2 vols., London, 1804). Dr. Green left a memoir of Dr. Witherspoon which remains in manuscript in the library of the New Jersey historical society at Newark. A colossal statue of Witherspoon was unveiled on 20 Oct., 1876, in Fairmount park, Philadelphia, Pa.

WITHERSPOON, Thomas Dwight, clergyman, b. in Greensborough, Hale co., Ala., 17 Jan., 1836. He was graduated at the University of Mississippi in 1856, studied theology, and became pastor of the Presbyterian church at Oxford, Miss., in 1859, was a chaplain in the army of the Confederacy for the whole duration of the civil war, then was settled at Memphis, Tenn., till 1870, when he was chosen chaplain of the University of Virginia for the usual period of two years. After his incumbency in that post he took charge of a church at Petersburg, Va., which he left in 1882 to become pastor of one in Louisville, Ky., and at the same time chairman of the evangelistic agency of the synod. He has been invited to various professorships and to the presidency of colleges, but would not leave the pastorate. The University of Mississippi gave him the degree of D. D. in 1868, and that of LL. D. in 1884. Dr. Witherspoon is the author of "Children of the Covenant" (Richmond, 1867), and "Letters on Romanism" (1877).

WITHINGTON, Leonard, clergyman, b. in Dorchester (now a part of Boston), Mass., 9 Aug., 1789; d. in Newbury, Mass., 22 April, 1885. He was graduated at Yale in 1814, studied theology at Andover seminary, was ordained as a Congregational minister on 31 Oct., 1816, and acted as pastor of the 1st church at Newbury till 1858, when he retired from the active duties of the ministry, though he continued to be connected with the church as senior pastor till his death. He received the degree of D. D. from Bowdoin in 1850. He published, besides numerous sermons, reviews, and lectures, "The Puritan, a Series of Essays," under the pen-name of "John Oldbug, Esq." (2 vols., Boston, 1836), afterward suppressing the edition; "Penitential Tears, or a Cry from the Dust by the Thirty-One" (1845), referring to the protest of Boston school-masters against the abolition of corporal punishment; and "Solomon's Song Translated and Explained," which was the fruit of nearly twoscore years of study (1861).

WITHROW, William Henry, Canadian author, b. in Toronto, 6 Aug., 1839. He was educated at Toronto academy, Victoria college, and Toronto university, and was graduated in 1864. He entered the ministry of the Methodist church in 1864, and was subsequently pastor consecutively at Waterford, Montreal, Hamilton, and Niagara. In 1874 he was elected editor of the "Canadian Methodist Magazine" at Toronto, which he has since held, and he is also editor of the Sunday-school periodicals of his denomination. He was professor of ethics and metaphysics in Wesleyan ladies' college at Hamilton in 1873-'4; was a member of the senate of Toronto university in 1868, and of Wesleyan theological college since 1880; was elected a fellow of the Royal society of Canada in 1884, and in 1882 received the degree of D. D. from Victoria university, Cobourg. He has travelled extensively, and has been identified with the cause of temperance in Canada. He has published "The Catacombs of Rome, and their Testimony relative to Primitive Christianity" (New York, 1874); "School History of Canada" (Toronto, 1876); "History of Canada" (Boston, 1878); "Worthies of Early Methodism" (Toronto, 1879); "Romance of Missions" (1879); "The King's Messenger, or Lawrence Temple's Probation" (1879); "Barbara Heck" (1880); "Great Preachers, Ancient and Modern" (1880); "Neville Trueman, the Pioneer Preacher" (1880); "A Canadian in Europe" (1881); "Valeria, the Martyr of the Catacombs" (1881); "Men Worth Knowing" (1883); "Life in a Parsonage, or Lights and Shadows of Itinerancy" (1885); and "The Dominion of Canada, Picturesque and Descriptive" (1888).

WITSEN, Willem Jacobus, Dutch physician, b. in Oesgeet, Holland, in 1739; d. near Rotterdam in 1808. He was educated at the University of Leyden, and went about 1765 to St. Eustatius, W. I., where he practised his profession and formed a valuable library. After holding the office of health commissioner of the colony, he was transferred to Surinam in the same capacity, and checked there an epidemic of yellow fever in 1779-'80, and the Asiatic cholera in 1783. He was maintained in his office when the colony was captured by the English and retaken by the French, and after the conclusion of peace he established a botanical garden in Surinam, and made several expeditions into the interior to collect medicinal plants. In 1797 he was appointed surgeon-inspector in the home navy department, and retired from active service in 1801, settling on an estate near Rotterdam, where he died. Among his works are "Tropiske Medicinske Voordenboek, gefolgden van een Verhandling over medicinske planten van Guiana" (Rotterdam, 1799), and "De plantarum Guianæ æconomia" (1802).

WITTE, Nicolas (vit-teh), Flemish missionary, known also as FRAY JUAN DE SAN PABLO, b. in Bruges about 1505; d. in Mexico, 21 Oct., 1565. It is said that he was a relative of the Emperor Charles V., who gave him a high office at court, but in 1532 he fled to the convent of San Agustín and became a monk, despite the emperor's entreaties. As he longed to labor in the New World, and had refused several bishoprics, he obtained leave in 1543 to go to New Spain. He learned the Indian dialects in Mexico, took charge in 1548 of the missions in the northern provinces, preaching in the native languages with remarkable success. He was given by the Indians the name of "El Noco," which means friend, or protector. Owing to his great favor with the emperor, he abolished in his missions the enforced labor to which the Indians had before been subjected, and, making known at court their true condition, succeeded in obtaining several imperial decrees, enacting improvements and measures for their welfare, not only in Mexico but in the whole of South America. He was prior successively of the convents of Chilapa and Mexico. Witte left to the convent of Burgos a rich library of books about Aztec and Toltec monuments. Besides manuscripts that are preserved in the archives of Simancas, and several letters published in the recent Spanish state publication "Cartas de Indias," he wrote "Ensayo sobre la lengua Mexicana" (Seville, 1561).

WOEDTKE, Frederick William (vet'-keh), Baron de, soldier, b. in Prussia, about 1740; d. near Lake George, N. Y., 31 July, 1776. He was for many years an officer in the army of Frederick the Great, attaining the rank of major. Coming to Philadelphia with letters of recommendation from friends of America in Paris, he was appointed a brigadier-general on 16 March, 1776, and ordered to join the Northern army. He took part, about three weeks before his death, in a council of war at Crown Point, which decided, against the advice of Col. John Stark and others, to evacuate that post and fall back on Mount Independence.

WOERT, or WERT, Jan Jacobus Sebald, Dutch navigator, b. about 1550; d. in Holland about 1612. He was in the service of the East Indian company, when he sailed as rear-admiral of the fleet of Jacobus Mahn, which was sent to explore the Strait of Magellan, and left Texel in June, 1598. The admiral having died at sea in September following, Simon Van Cordes succeeded in command, and Woert became vice-admiral. After visiting Buenos Ayres and making soundings along the coast of Patagonia, they anchored in April, 1599, at the Pinguin islands, and a few weeks later discovered Nassau island, where the admiral established his headquarters, while Woert made journeys into the interior and had friendly intercourse with the natives. They entered the South sea on 10 Sept., and the next day Woert's ship was carried by a storm back into the straits. Unable to unite the fleet, he returned to Nassau island, whence he led surveying expeditions along the strait, prepared a valuable chart, and discovered the Sebald islands on 28 Feb., 1600. He reached Amsterdam in the following June, and in 1604 commanded a new expedition to the Strait of Magellan. Some authors assert that he died during the journey, but others contend that he sailed to the south till he encountered ice-fields. The clerk of the expedition wrote a narrative of Woert's discovery, which was translated into French as "Relation de l'expédition des amiraux Jacques Mahn, Simon de Cordes et Jean Sebald Woert, faite au détroit de Magellan" (Leyden, 1603). There is a Latin version by Jan Laet, which is included in his "Novus orbis, seu descriptionis occidentalis" (Leyden, 1633).

WOLCOTT, Roger, colonial governor, b. in Windsor, Conn., 4 Jan., 1679; d. in East Windsor (then a part of Windsor), Conn., 17 May, 1767. The frontier settlement in which he grew up afforded him no opportunities of early education. At the age of twelve he was apprenticed to a weaver, and on reaching his majority he established himself in business, and acquired a competence. He was a representative in 1709, became a justice of the peace in the following year, and in 1711 acted as commissary of the Connecticut forces in the expedition against Canada. He became a member of the council in 1714, judge of the county court in 1721, a judge of the supreme court in 1732, and deputy governor and chief judge of the supreme court in 1741. In 1745 he commanded the Connecticut contingent of the forces that were sent by the colonies against Louisburg, with the rank of major-general, and in the siege of that place was second in command under Sir William Pepperell. He was elected governor in 1750, and held the office till 1754, when he retired from public life, and devoted his after-years to literary pursuits and religious meditation. He published "Poetical Meditations," a small volume of verse (New London, 1725), containing, with six shorter pieces, a narrative poem called "A Brief Account of the Agency of the Hon. John Winthrop in the Court of King Charles the Second," which has been reprinted in the "Collections" of the Massachusetts historical society. Some of the other poems are given in Charles W. Everest's "Poets of Connecticut" (New York, 1843); and a letter to the Rev. Peter Hobart entitled "The New England Congregational Churches are and always have been Consociated Churches" (1761).—His son, Erastus, soldier, b. in East Windsor, Conn., 21 Sept., 1722; d. there, 14 Sept., 1793, was repeatedly elected to the general assembly, and was chosen speaker of the lower house, was a justice of the peace and a judge of probate, and became chief judge of the county court. He was sent to Boston in 1775 to observe the movements of the British troops. Early in 1776 he joined Gen. Washington's army before Boston with a regiment of Connecticut militia, and in the summer of that year he garrisoned the forts at New London with his men. He was appointed a brigadier-general of militia in 1777, and led the 1st brigade of Connecticut troops on the expedition to Peekskill, N. Y., and then to Danbury, Conn. He was chosen a delegate to the Continental congress, but did not serve. After the Revolution he was a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut.—

—Another son, Oliver, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Windsor, Conn., 26 Nov., 1726; d. in Litchfield, Conn., 1 Dec., 1797, was graduated at Yale in 1747, and in the same year was commissioned as captain by the governor of New York, and, raising a company of volunteers, served on the northern frontier till his regiment was disbanded after the signature of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. He then studied medicine with his brother, Dr. Alexander Wolcott, but in 1751, before he entered into practice, he was chosen sheriff of the newly organized county of Litchfield. He was a member of the council continuously from 1774 till 1786, and at the same time judge of the county court of common pleas, and also judge of probate for the Litchfield district many years. He was active in the militia organization, and rose through all the grades from a captaincy to the rank of major-general. Adhering to the American cause from the beginning of the Revolutionary troubles, he was appointed by the Continental congress in July, 1775, one of the commissioners of Indian affairs for the northern department, who were intrusted with the task of inducing the Iroquois Indians to remain neutral. The Wyoming controversy between Connecticut and Pennsylvania, and, still more, the dispute between the settlers of Vermont and the authorities of the state of New York, which endangered the harmonious action of the colonies, were compromised largely through his exertions. A gilded leaden statue of George III., that had been erected on Bowling Green in New York city in 1770, was thrown down by the citizens in 1776, and was taken to Gen. Wolcott's place in Litchfield, where his daughters and their friends converted the material into cartridges for the militia. He was elected to the second Continental congress, and took his seat in January, 1776, remaining during the debates on the Declaration of Independence and until after it was adopted. He then returned to Connecticut, and was appointed by the governor and council of safety to the command of the fourteen regiments of Connecticut militia that were sent for the defence of New York. He organized this force, and when it was divided into brigades returned to his home, and in November resumed his seat in congress, which, a month later, was driven from Philadelphia, and continued its sessions in Baltimore. During the summer of 1777 he was employed in organizing bodies of militia, in active operations, and in corresponding with other patriots on military matters. He brought re-enforcements of several thousand men to the assistance of Gen. Israel Putnam on Hudson river, and then joined the northern army under Gen. Horatio Gates with three or four hundred volunteers, and was assigned to the command of a brigade of militia which took part in the defeat of Gen. John Burgoyne. In February, 1778, he resumed his place in congress, which was then sitting at York, Pa. He was not elected to the next congress. In the summer of 1779, when the British ravaged the coast of Connecticut, he took the field at the head of a division of militia. In 1780 he was again elected a representative in congress, and continued a member till 1784, although he did not regularly attend the sessions. In 1785 he was appointed one of the commissioners of Indian affairs for the northern department who negotiated a treaty of peace with the Six Nations. He was elected lieutenant-governor of Connecticut in 1786, and re-elected till 1796, when he was chosen governor, which office he held at the time of his death. —Oliver's son, Oliver, secretary of the treasury, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 11 Jan., 1760; d. in New York city, 1 June, 1833, was graduated at Yale in 1778, having in the previous year taken part as a militiaman in encounters with the British who attempted to capture the Continental stores at Danbury. He studied law at Litchfield, at the same time accompanying his father to the coast in 1779 as a volunteer aid, and discharging later the duties of quartermaster at Litchfield. He was admitted to the bar in January, 1781, removed to Hartford, became a clerk in the financial department of the state government, and in 1782 was appointed a member of the committee of the pay-table. In May, 1784, he was commissioned, with Oliver Ellsworth, to adjust the claims of Connecticut against the U. S. government. He was appointed comptroller of public accounts when that office was created in 1788. When the National government was organized under the new constitution, in September, 1789, he received the appointment of auditor of the treasury. He became comptroller of the treasury in the spring of 1791, retaining that office in preference to the presidency of the United States bank, which he was offered on its organization in the summer of that year. On 2 Feb.,

Oliver Wolcott

1795, he succeeded Alexander Hamilton as secretary of the treasury. He offered his resignation on the accession of John Adams to the presidency, but was continued in office till 8 Nov., 1800, when he peremptorily resigned. He had been subjected to gross slanders, his political opponents accusing the Federalist officials of burning the treasury buildings in order to conceal peculations. He therefore called for an investigation, and the hostile committee of the house of representatives kept alive the malicious insinuation by reporting that they had obtained no evidence regarding the fire in the treasury department that enabled them to form a "conjecture satisfactory." President Adams forthwith nominated Mr. Wolcott judge of the U. S. circuit court for the 2d district, embracing the states of Connecticut, Vermont, and New York, and the senate shielded his reputation by unanimously confirming the nomination. In 1802 he lost his judgeship by the repeal of the judiciary act under which he had been appointed. He then engaged in mercantile business in New York city, and in 1803 was elected president of the Merchants' bank, which, however, soon afterward was destroyed by the operation of the law known as the "restraining act." When the charter of the first United States bank expired, Wolcott employed his capital in founding the Bank of North America, and was chosen its first president, holding the office from 1812 till 1814, when he retired, in consequence of political differences between himself and the directors. He was the Democratic candidate for governor of Connecticut in 1815, and was defeated, but in 1817 he was elected, and in the same year was a member of the convention that framed the new state constitution, and was chosen to preside over that body. He was annually re-elected to the governorship for ten years. Subsequently he resumed his residence in New York city.

WOLF, George, governor of Pennsylvania, b. in Allen township, Northampton co., Pa., 12 Aug., 1777; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 March, 1840. He was the son of a German emigrant, was educated at a classical school, taught for some time, and then studied law. Attaching himself to the Republican party at the beginning of the administration of Thomas Jefferson, he was appointed postmaster at Easton, and afterward clerk of the Northampton county orphans' court, remaining in that post till 1809. In 1814 he was elected to the state house of representatives. He was elected to congress without opposition, taking his seat on 9 Dec., 1823, and was returned at the two succeeding elections, taking the protectionist side in the debates on the tariff, and serving till 3 March, 1829. In that year he was elected governor. After inducing the legislature to prosecute the construction of canals and impose new taxes for the liquidation of debts that had already been incurred on account of internal improvements, he urged the establishment of a general system of common schools, and by strenuous efforts accomplished this reform where former governors had failed. He was once re-elected, serving six years as governor, and was then defeated as a candidate for a third term, owing to the defection of a part of the Democrats who voted for Henry A. Muhlenberg. In the following year President Jackson appointed him first comptroller of the treasury. He entered on the functions of this office on 18 June, 1836. Retiring on 23 Feb., 1838, he was in the same year appointed collector of the port of Philadelphia, and held that office till he died. He was recognized as the "father of the public-school system" by the erection of a memorial gateway at Easton, which was unveiled on 29 June, 1888.

WOLF, Simon, lawyer, b. in Hinzweiler, Bavaria, 28 Oct., 1836. He emigrated to the United States at an early age, and for several years followed business pursuits, but began to read law, and was graduated at the Cleveland law-school in 1861. In 1862 he went to Washington, and in 1869 he was appointed recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, holding that office until May, 1878. In July, 1881, he received the post of consul-general in Egypt, which he resigned in May, 1882. He has been active in Jewish charitable and educational movements, and is a frequent lecturer on social, literary, and political topics.

WOLFE, James, British soldier, b. in Westerham, Kent, England, 2 Jan., 1727; d. near Quebec, Canada, 13 Sept., 1759. He was a son of Lieut.-Col. Edward Wolfe, an officer distinguished for skill and bravery in Marlborough's campaigns. James was educated at Greenwich. His military life began early, and with such unmistakable evidences of great ability that at the age of sixteen he served as adjutant of his regiment in the campaign of Dettingen. In the suppression of the Scottish rebellion of 1745 he served as major and deputy quartermaster-general, while his father was a major-general, commanding a division. He was engaged in the Netherlands in 1747-'8, on garrison duty in Scotland and Ireland in 1748-'53, and in England in 1753-'7. In 1758 he had reached the grade of brigadier-general, and commanded one of Gen. Jeffrey Amherst's divisions at the siege of Louisburg, where he was distinguished for his gallantry. The next year he was promoted major-general, and placed by William Pitt in command of the expedition against Quebec. In the latter part of June, 1759, he arrived before that city with a force of 8,000 men, supported by a powerful fleet, and, after erecting batteries at Point Levi and the isle of Orleans, he opened fire on the enemy's defences, which had been greatly strengthened by the French commander-in-chief. (See MONTCALM.) The large ships of war being unable to co-operate by reason of their draught, he next took position near the mouth of Montmorency river and made a bold attack on the French works, which was repelled with loss. Various other plans were now proposed by Wolfe, but rejected by his officers. Sir Jeffrey Amherst failed to co-operate as had been promised, and the approach of winter necessitated the speedy departure of the fleet. Wolfe sent many desponding messages to Pitt, and the appointment of the young general to the command was severely criticised in England. As a final plan, Wolfe transferred his troops to a point several miles above the city. While reconnoitring the precipitous bluffs called the Heights of Abraham, on the north shore of the river, he detected the cove that is now called by his name, about two miles from Quebec, whence a narrow path wound up the cliff. Determining to surprise the French by this difficult route, he spent a day and a night in preparation, and at one o'clock on the morning of 13 Sept. embarked about 5,000 men in boats, which dropped noiselessly down the river to the landing-place. By sunrise the entire force had completed the ascent, and soon after ten o'clock they confronted the French force, which was superior in numbers but composed chiefly of undisciplined provincials. After an hour's cannonade Montcalm attacked impetuously, but his men were driven back in confusion, and Wolfe, pressing to the front, ordered the Louisburg grenadiers to charge the enemy. While cheering on his men, he received two wounds, the second of which ended his life, but not until he was assured of the defeat of the French. Five days later Quebec surrendered, and the English became masters of Canada. Wolfe's remains were carried to England, where a monument was erected to him in Westminster Abbey. The Massachusetts assembly also voted a marble statue of him. A small column marks the spot where he fell, and an obelisk sixty feet in height has been placed in the government gardens at Quebec in his honor and that of his enemy Montcalm, who fell in the same battle. See Robert Wright's "Life of James Wolfe" (London, 1864), and Francis Parkman's "Montcalm and Wolfe" (Boston, 1885).

WOLFE, John David, merchant, b. in New York city, 24 July, 1792; d. there, 17 May, 1872. He was the son of David Wolfe (1758-1836), who served during the Revolutionary war as captain in a militia company and later as assistant quartermaster under Col. Timothy Pickering with the army under Gen. Washington. The boy was educated for a commercial life, and became a successful hardware-merchant and the head of the firm of Wolfe and Bishop. He gave largely to benevolent objects, especially for the relief of orphans, aged persons, and prisoners, and for the promotion of religion and education under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal church. For some time he was a vestryman of Trinity, and at the time of his death was senior warden of Grace church. He founded a high-school for girls, known as "Wolfe hall," at Denver, Col., and a diocesan school for girls at Topeka, Kan., gave the building for the theological seminary connected with Kenyon college, and a fund for the College of the Sisters of Bethany, at Topeka, Kan., built homes for crippled and destitute children and for impoverished Christian men, in Suffolk county, N. Y., and, with Mrs. Peter Cooper, established the Sheltering Arms charity in New York city. Mr. Wolfe was associated in the organization of St. Johnland, was its first president, and a liberal contributor to its support. He was also president of the Working-women's protective union, vice-president of the society of the New York hospital, also an active officer in other charitable organizations, and president of the American museum of natural history. Mr. Wolfe prepared a "Mission Service," consisting of suitable portions of the "Book of Common Prayer," which he had translated into German, Spanish, and French, and in all circulated more than 130,000 copies. See "A Memorial of John David Wolfe," by Evert A. Duyckinck (New York, 1872). His wife was Dorothea Ann, a daughter of Peter Lorillard.—Their daughter, Catharine Lorillard, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 28 March, 1828; d. there, 4 April, 1887, inherited from her father's and grandfather's estates a well-invested fortune of about $10,000,000, and expended at first $100,000, and, as her income increased, as much as $250,000, each year for benevolent purposes. She aided the charities that her father established, carried out his design in giving a site for the Home for incurables at Fordham, N. Y., gave about $100,000 to Union college, $30,000 to St. Luke's hospital, New York city, and $65,000 to St. Johnland on Long Island; largely aided in building the American chapel at Rome, and contributed a large sum to the one in Paris;

established an Italian mission, costing $50,000, and a newsboys' lodging-house, and a diocesan house which, including its endowment, cost $170,000. This was her last act of public charity. She also founded or built schools and churches in many places in the west and south, added to the funds of Alexandria seminary, the American school at Athens, Griswold college, and distributed large amounts annually among the indigent clergy and the deserving poor through the ministers and charitable institutions of the Protestant Episcopal church. In 1884 she sent an expedition to Asia Minor in charge of Dr. William H. Ward, which made important archæological discoveries. Miss Wolfe took special interest in Grace church, of which she was a member, and during her life gave to it the chantry, the reredos, a large memorial window, and Grace house, all of which amounted to over $250,000. By her will she left an endowment of $350,000 to that church. Her fondness for art was shown in her residence at 13 Madison avenue, which was filled with paintings, many of which she selected during her visits abroad, and of these Ludwig Knaus's "Holy Family" and Gabriel Max's "The Last Greeting" are the best known. In addition to her city house she owned a villa at Newport, R. I., that was elegantly furnished, and other country houses. Miss Wolfe left her valuable collection of modern paintings to the Metropolitan museum of art, together with $200,000 for its preservation and enlargement.

WOLFF, Bernard Crouse, clergyman, b. in Martinsburg, Va., 11 Dec., 1794; d. in Lancaster, Pa., 1 Nov., 1870. He received a classical education at the Chambersburg high-school, studied theology at the seminary of the German Reformed church at York, Pa., after having carried on business as a mechanic in Martinsburg for thirteen years, and became the English pastor of the church at Easton, Pa., in 1833. In 1845 he left that place to become pastor of a Reformed church in Baltimore, Md., and in 1854 became professor of didactic and practical theology in the seminary at Mercersburg. After retiring from the chair in 1864 he removed to Lancaster, and was active and successful in obtaining contributions for Franklin and Marshall college. Rutgers gave him the degree of D. D. in 1843. He was for several years president of the German Reformed board of foreign missions, a member of the liturgical committee from 1849 till 1868, when the liturgy was completed, and a frequent contributor to the church publications, having begun his literary labors while a theological student by editing the "German Reformed Magazine." He translated for his classes Johann H. A. Ebrard's "Christliche Dogmatik," and was engaged in preparing the work for publication when he died.

WOLLE, Peter, Moravian bishop, b. on the island of St. John, W. I., 5 Jan., 1792; d. in Bethlehem, Pa., 14 Nov., 1871. His father, a Moravian missionary in the West Indies, came to this country in 1800, and placed his son in school at Nazareth, Pa. Peter was afterward one of the first three graduates of the theological seminary of the American Moravian church, and after his ordination had charge of the churches at Lancaster, Philadelphia, and Lititz. While laboring at Lititz he was consecrated to the episcopacy, 26 Sept., 1845. He was an active member of the executive or governing board of the northern district of the church for nearly twenty-five years, and at his death was senior bishop of the Moravian church in Europe and America. He possessed a thorough knowledge of music, and by direction of the synod revised and rearranged the hymn-tunes that are now in use in the Moravian churches.—His nephew, Francis, botanist, b. in Jacobsburg, near Nazareth, Pa., 17 Dec., 1817, was educated in the Moravian parochial school in Bethlehem, and then became a clerk in his father's store. Subsequently he taught, first at Nazareth hall and then in the higher departments of the Moravian parochial school in Bethlehem. He became in 1857 vice-principal of the Moravian seminary for young ladies, and in 1861 principal of that institution, which place he held until 1881. He was ordained a clergyman in the Moravian church in 1861, but is now retired. In 1852 he patented in the United States, and later in France and England, a machine that he devised for making paper bags. It was the first of its kind, and covers the fundamental principle of the many similar machines that are now used. From early boyhood he made natural history a study, particularly entomology, which later gave place to botany. At first he studied phænogams, then cryptogams, especially musci, hepaticæ, and finally the fresh-water algæ of the United States. He has contributed papers on his specialties to the "Bulletin of the Torrey Botanical Club," and similar periodicals. His works, which are recognized as authorities both in this country and abroad, are "Desmids of the United States, and List of Pedicellulæ," with 1,100 illustrations by the author (Bethlehem, Pa., 1884), and "The Fresh-Water Algæ of the United States," with 2,300 illustrations by the author (2 vols., 1887).

WOLLENWEBER, Louis August, author, b. in Speyer, on the Rhine, Germany, 5 Dec., 1807; d. in Reading, Pa., 25 July, 1888. He was educated at Speyer for the trade of a printer, was employed at his vocation at Homburg, and was compelled to emigrate to this country in consequence of his being one of the agitators of the "Hambacher Volksfest." After his arrival in Philadelphia he was first engaged on the "Schnellpost," afterward founded a new German paper, "Der Freimuehtige," and subsequently acquired possession of the "Demokrat," the chief German newspaper in Philadelphia. In 1853 he sold the "Demokrat," and afterward resided in the Lebanon valley and in Reading. He was a frequent correspondent of the German newspapers, and published "Sketches of Domestic Life in Pennsylvania," a collection of poems and sketches in the mixed German and English of the Pennsylvania Germans (Philadelphia, 1869); "Treu bis in den Tod" (1875); and "Zwei treue Kameraden" (1878).

WOLLEY, Charles, clergyman, b. in Lincoln, England, about 1652; the date of his death is unknown. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1673, sailed for New York, 27 May, 1678, in company with Sir Edmund Andros, and was chaplain of Fort James there from the date of his arrival till 1680, when he returned to England. He is said to have been afterward settled at Alford, Lincolnshire. He published "A Two Years' Journal in New York, and Part of its Territories in America" (London, 1701), of which a new edition, with copious historical and biographical notes, was issued by Edmund B. O'Callaghan (New York, 1860).

WOLSELEY, Garnet Joseph, Viscount, British soldier, b. in Golden Bridge house, near Dublin, Ireland, 4 June, 1833. He is the son of an army officer, and is descended from a Staffordshire family. He was educated privately, entered the army as ensign in March, 1852, became a captain in 1855, major in 1858, and colonel in June, 1865. He served in the Burmese war of 1852-'3, in the war in the Crimea, was severely wounded at the siege of Sebastopol, and received the decoration of the Legion of honor and the Turkish order of the Medjidieh. During the Sepoy mutiny in 1857 he was at the siege and capture of Lucknow, and at the defence of Alumbugh. He was sent to Canada when difficulties arose with the United States in consequence of the affair of the "Trent," November, 1861, and afterward visited the Confederate camps. In 1867 he was appointed deputy quartermaster-general of Canada, and in 1869 commanded the expeditionary force that was sent to suppress the insurrectionary government of Louis Riel at Fort Garry, and was knighted for his services. He commanded the troops during the Ashantee war of 1873-'4, and for his success was promoted a major-general, and received the thanks of parliament and £25,000. In April, 1874, he was appointed to command the auxiliary forces, in 1875 was sent to Natal as administrator of its government, and in 1876 was nominated a member of the council of India. In 1878 he was sent to organize the government of Cyprus; in June, 1879, he returned to Natal, and, as governor of Natal and the Transvaal, took charge of the work of organizing a government in Zululand, and conducted the subsequent campaign against Secoeni. Returning in May, 1880, he was appointed quartermaster-general, became adjutant-general of the army in April, 1882, and the same year was commander-in-chief of the force that was sent to Egypt. For his services on this occasion he was gazetted Baron Wolseley of Cairo, and of Wolseley in the county of Stafford on 20 Nov., 1882, and he was also promoted a general in 1882. In 1884-'5 he was commander-in-chief in Egypt, and conducted the futile operations for the relief of Khartoum, and on his return he was made a viscount. He is now adjutant-general of the British army. He has received degrees from various colleges, and has published a "Narrative of the War with China in 1860" (London, 1862); "The Soldier's Pocket-Book for Field Service" (1869); "The System of Field Manœuvres best adapted for enabling our Troops to meet a Continental Army" (1872); and "France as a Military Power in 1870 and 1878" (1878).

WOOD, Alphonso, botanist, b. in Chesterfield, N. H., 17 Sept., 1810; d. in West Farms, N. Y., 4 Jan., 1881. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1834, and then studied for a year in Andover theological seminary. Subsequently he taught in Kimball union academy, Meriden, N. H., until 1849, after which he followed the practice of civil engineering for three years. In 1851 he became president of the Ohio female seminary, where he remained until 1857 and then accepted a professorship in Terre Haute female college, Ind. He was chosen principal of Clinton female seminary in Brooklyn, which post he held until 1865, and then after travelling for a year he settled in 1867 in West Farms, N. Y. Prof. Wood made a specialty of botany and published "Class-Book of Botany," of which 100,000 copies have been sold (Boston, 1845); "First Lessons in Botany" (1848); "Leaves and Flowers, or Object Lessons in Botany" (New York, 1863); "The American Botanist and Florist" (1870); and "Plant Record" (1877). He edited a translation from the German of "Poetry from the Vegetable World" (Cincinnati, 1853).

WOOD, Charles, clergyman, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 3 June, 1851. He was graduated at Haverford college, Pa., in 1870, and at the theological seminary at Princeton in 1873. He was pastor of the Central Presbyterian church, Buffalo, N. Y., in 1873-'8, afterward passed a year in study in Germany, made a tour around the world, and, returning to this country in November, 1881, became pastor of the 4th Presbyterian church, Albany, N. Y. In March, 1886, he assumed charge of the 1st Presbyterian church in Germantown, the suburb of Philadelphia, Pa. Mr. Wood was delegate of the Presbyterian church of the United States to the general assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1879. He has been a frequent contributor to periodical literature, and has published "A Memorial of Dr. John C. Lord" (Buffalo, 1878) and "Saunterings in Europe" (New York, 1882).

WOOD, Charlotte Matilda, actress, b. in England in 1836. She came of an old theatrical family named Vining. She married John Wood, and with her husband played her first important engagement at Manchester, appearing as Audrey to her husband's Touchstone. Mr. and Mrs. John Wood came to the United States in 1854, and Mrs. Wood made her début in Boston as Gertrude in "A Loan of a Lover." In 1859 they visited California, where she undertook the management of the San Francisco American theatre. There she separated from her husband, who died in Vancouver's island, 28 May, 1863. Returning to New York, Mrs. Wood appeared, in May, 1860, at the Olympic theatre, to which she gave that name, it having previously been known as Laura Keane's theatre, of which she subsequently became the manager, and remained until 1866, when she returned to England, where she acted at the Princess theatre in London under the management of her cousin, George Vining. Appearing there in "Barnaby Rudge," she was not well received, her audience mistaking her for an American, and actors of that nationality being then unfavorably regarded by the English public. Since that time Mrs. Wood has played in London, where she has also managed several theatres with success and created many new characters. Among her latest successes are the principal characters in "The Magistrate," "The School-Mistress," and "Dandy Dick." On 24 Sept., 1888, she appeared at the new Court theatre with a comedy entitled "Mamma," an adaptation of "Les surprises de divorce." On the same evening her daughter, Florence, made a successful début.

WOOD, De Volson, engineer, b. in Smyrna, N. Y., 1 June, 1832. He was graduated at the Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1857 with the degree of C. E., and at once became assistant professor of civil engineering at the University of Michigan, where he was made full professor two years later. In 1872 he was chosen professor of mathematics and mechanics in the Stevens institute of technology, Hoboken, and in 1885 he was transferred to the chair of engineering, which he still retains. Prof. Wood designed an ore-dock at Marquette, Mich., in 1866, and has invented a rock-drill, a steam-pump, and an air-compressor. In 1881 he was chosen president of the board of education in Boonton, N. J. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Hamilton in 1859, and that of M. S. by the University of Michigan in the same year. Prof. Wood is a member of the American society of civil engineers and of the American association for the advancement of science, and corresponding member of the American society of architects. He has contributed to mathematical and engineering journals and has published "Treatise on the Resistance of Materials" (New York, 1871); "A Treatise on the Theory of the Construction of Bridges and Roofs" (1872); "The Elements of Analytical Mechanics" (1876); "Principles of Elementary Mechanics" (1878); "The Elements of Co-ordinate Geometry" (1879);

"The Mechanics of Fluids" (1884); "Trigonometry, Analytical, Plane, and Spherical" (1885); and "Thermodynamics" (1887).

WOOD, Edmund Burke, Canadian jurist, b. near Fort Erie, Ont., 13 Feb., 1820; d. in Winnipeg, Manitoba, 7 Oct., 1882. He was graduated at Oberlin in 1848, studied law, and in 1853 was admitted to the Canadian bar as an attorney. In 1854 he was called to the bar of Ontario, and entered into partnership with Peter Ball Long. In 1863 he was elected to parliament as a supporter of the Macdonald-Dorion government. He sat in the house until 1867, when the union of the colonies took place. At the first general election afterward he presented himself for a seat in the Ontario house of assembly. In those days dual representation was allowed, and he was elected to a seat in both the legislative assembly of Ontario and the house of commons of Canada. In July, 1867, Mr. Wood entered the Ontario coalition ministry of John Sandfield Macdonald as provincial treasurer. He became an expert financial minister, and his budget speeches rank among the best that were delivered in the Ontario legislature. In December, 1871, he resigned his office, but he continued to sit in the assembly as a private member. In 1872 he was made a queen's counsel, and in the following year was elected a bencher of the Law society. In 1873 Mr. Wood resigned his seat in the Ontario legislature, and, announcing his candidature for the house of commons, was returned by acclamation. He held his seat until 11 March, 1874, when the Mackenzie-Dorion administration appointed him chief justice of Manitoba. As a member of the house of commons he took part in the attack on Sir John A. Macdonald and his cabinet in the Pacific scandal question. While treasurer of Ontario he introduced the scheme for the settlement of the municipal loan fund of Upper Canada, and brought to a conclusion the financial arbitration between Ontario and Quebec provinces consequent on confederation, drafting the award with his own hand. In 1871 his popularity and political standing suffered somewhat in consequence of the charge that he had betrayed his leader during the time that the fortunes of his government were hanging in the balance. He possessed a voice of singularly deep notes, and Thomas D'Arcy McGee gave him the name of "Big Thunder." As chief justice he instituted many important reforms in the legal procedure of the courts of Manitoba. In the celebrated case of The Queen vs. Ambrose Lepine for the murder of Thomas Scott at Fort Garry, during the Red river rebellion, Judge Wood's decision was confirmed by the law officers of the crown in England. In 1882 an attempt was made in the house of commons at Ottawa to impeach him on the grounds of "misconduct, corruption, injustice, conspiracy, partiality, and arbitrariness," and a petition was sent to parliament in which these charges were preferred. The judge returned an answer of 128 pages octavo, in which he denied the accusations, explained the transactions to which the petitioners referred, and assailed the character of his opponents. Parliament appointed a special commission to deal with the question, but, as the chief justice died late in the autumn, the matter was dropped.

WOOD, Eleazer Derby, soldier, b. in New York city in 1783; d. near Fort Erie, Upper Canada, 17 Sept., 1814. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, 30 Oct., 1806, appointed 2d lieutenant in the corps of engineers, and assisted in the construction of Castle Williams, Governor's island, N. Y., and Fort Norfolk, Va. In the war with Great Britain he conducted the defence of Fort Meigs during its siege, was engaged in the sortie of 5 May, 1813, and was in command of the artillery at the battle of the Thames, 5 Oct. following. He was appointed acting adjutant-general to Gen. William Henry Harrison in October, 1813, was transferred to the Northern army in 1814, and engaged in all the events of that campaign, including the capture of Fort Erie on 3 July and the battles of Chippewa and Niagara, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for bravery at the last-named action. After the battle of Niagara the American army fell back to Fort Erie. Col. Wood, in command of the 21st infantry, participated in the repulse of the assault on this fort, 15 Aug., 1814, and was killed in a sortie a few days afterward. Wood county, Ohio, which contains the site of Fort Meigs, and Fort Wood on Bedlow's island, New York harbor, were named in his honor. Gen. Jacob Brown erected a handsome monument to his memory at West Point.

WOOD, Fernando, mayor of New York city, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 June, 1812; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 Feb., 1881. He was of Quaker descent, and went to New York city in 1820, where he early entered business and became a shipping-merchant. From the time that he attained his majority he was active in public matters, and attracted notice by his writing and speaking. In 1839 he was chairman of the chief young men's political organization in New York city, and a year later he was elected as a Democrat to congress, serving from 31 May, 1841, till 3 March, 1843. On the expiration of his term he returned to his business, which occupied his attention until his retirement in 1850. He was then nominated by the Democratic party for the mayoralty of New York city, but was defeated by a combination of the Whig and Know-Nothing parties. He was a successful candidate in 1854, at a time when the city government was in a state of demoralization, and he at once devised a municipal system to secure good government. Various reforms were introduced and were received with such satisfaction that he was re-elected by the better element of both parties in 1856. During the winter of 1856-'7 a bill was passed by the state legislature depriving the mayor of all control of the police, and abolishing the municipal force. Acting by advice of the counsel of the corporation and of Charles O'Connor, he refused to recognize the change, and endeavored to maintain the municipal police, for which the authority had been in existence for 200 years. The metropolitan police was organized, and a collision between the two forces occurred, resulting in a serious riot. (See MATSELL, GEORGE.) Ultimately the municipal police went out of existence, and at the ensuing election Mr. Wood was defeated. He was again elected in 1859, and in January, 1861, when the question of secession was foremost, recommended that New York secede and become a free city. Mr. Wood then returned to congress and served from 7 Dec., 1863, till 3 March, 1865. After a year in Europe he was re-elected to congress and served from 4 March, 1867, till 3 March, 1877.—His brother, Benjamin, journalist, b. in Shelbyville, Ky., 13 Oct., 1820, received a common-school education, and early became self-supporting. In the capacity of a supercargo, he went to the West Indies and Central America. Subsequently he engaged in business in New York city, and in 1860 he purchased the "Daily News" and became its editor. He supported Stephen A. Douglas in his canvass for the presidency in 1860, becoming chairman of the committee of editors that met in the Astor house. Mr. Wood was elected to congress in the same year and served, with re-election, from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1865. Throughout his career in Washington he persistently opposed the continuation of the civil war, and his conduct in that respect led to the preferring of charges against him in the house, with the result that the matter was referred to a committee for consideration; but no action was taken in the matter. His paper was suppressed for eighteen months during the first years of the war. On 29 April, 1867, he began its publication as an evening journal, at the price of one cent a copy. It was the first daily to be issued at that price after the war, and it attained the largest circulation of any journal in the United States, and the third largest of any daily paper in the world. In March, 1876, he founded the "New Yorker Tages-Nachrichten," a German evening paper, which is still continued, and previously he established the "New York Sunday News." Mr. Wood is the author of "Fort Lafayette, or Love and Secession" (New York, 1862).

WOOD, George, lawyer, b. in Chesterfield, Burlington co., N. J., 17 Jan., 1789; d. in New York city, 17 March, 1860. He was graduated at Princeton in 1808, and, after studying law with Richard Stockton, was admitted to the bar in 1812. Settling in New Brunswick, he soon rivalled his preceptor, and he has been referred to as the ablest lawyer that his state ever produced. His power of analogical reasoning was very striking, and he had the faculty of so stating a question as to make the mere statement an argument in itself. The law of this country on charitable devises was in a great degree unsettled in his time, but Mr. Wood was able to elucidate that subject in such a manner as to form a guide for the decisions and learning of this country. In 1831 he went to New York city, where he took a high rank among lawyers, and he was engaged in chief cases not only there but throughout the United States. In his later years his efforts were much directed toward the maintenance of sound government principles, and to the preservation of the constitution in its integrity. On one occasion, when William C. Preston, of South Carolina, was about to argue an important case in the U. S. supreme court, Daniel Webster asked him who was on the other side. Preston replied that it was a man from New York, whose name he could not recall, and said, "a sleepy-looking fellow named Wood, I think." "If it is George Wood," said Webster, "I advise you to look out how you wake him up." The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by Hamilton college in 1842 and by Union in 1845.

WOOD, George, author, b. in Newburyport, Mass., in 1799; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 24 Aug., 1870. He studied under Samuel L. Knapp, and removed with his mother and family to Alexandria, Va., in 1816. He was a clerk in the war department in 1819-'22, and in the treasury in 1822-'45, after which he removed to New York, but returned to Washington, resumed his clerical labors in the treasury department, and became chief of the navigation division. Mr. Wood contributed to the "Knickerbocker Magazine" in 1846-'7, and to the "National Era," of Washington, and other periodicals. He published "Peter Schlemihl in America" (Philadelphia, 1848); "The Modern Pilgrim: showing the Improvements in Travel, with the Newest Methods of Reaching the Celestial City" (2 vols., Boston, 1855); "Marrying Too Late: a Tale" (New York, 1856); and "Future Life, or Scenes in Another World" (1858). On the publication of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps's "Gates Ajar," Mr. Wood's last-named book was reissued with the title "The Gates Wide Open" (Boston, 1869), and four editions were sold in one week.

WOOD, George Bacon, author, b. in Greenwich, Cumberland co., N. J., 13 March, 1797; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 March, 1879. His parents were members of the Society of Friends. He received his early education in the city of New York, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1815, and in medicine in 1818, and in 1820 delivered a course of lectures on chemistry in Philadelphia. He was professor of chemistry in the Philadelphia college of pharmacy in 1822-'31, of materia medica in 1831-'5, held the same chair in the University of Pennsylvania in 1835-'50, and that of the theory and practice of medicine in that institution from 1850 till 1860, when he resigned. He was eminently successful as a lecturer, and while in the chair of materia medica exhibited to the students many specimens of rare living tropical and other exotics, which he had secured at great expense, and of which he had occasion to treat in his lectures. In 1865 he endowed an auxiliary faculty of medicine in the University of Pennsylvania composed of five chairs—zoölogy and comparative anatomy, botany, mineralogy and geology, hygiene, and medical jurisprudence and toxicology—and by will he endowed the Peter Hahn ward of the University hospital. He was physician in the Pennsylvania hospital in 1835-'59, became president of the American philosophical society in 1859, and was for many years president of the College of physicians of Philadelphia. With Franklin Bache, M. D., he published "The Dispensatory of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1833). Of this work 150,000 copies were sold during Dr. Wood's lifetime, the royalty to the authors being about $155,000. He also published "A Treatise on the Practice of Medicine" (2 vols., 1847); "A Treatise on Therapeutics and Pharmacology, or Materia Medica" (2 vols., 1856); "Introductory Lectures and Addresses on Medical Subjects" (1859); and, of lesser works, "History of the University of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1827); "Memoir of Samuel G. Morton" (1853); and "Memoirs of Franklin Bache" (1865).—His nephew, Horatio C., physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 Jan., 1841, was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1862, and established himself in practice in Philadelphia, making specialties of therapeutics and nervous diseases. In 1866 he was appointed professor of botany in the auxiliary medical faculty of the University of Pennsylvania, but in 1876 he relinquished this department to accept the chair of therapeutics. In 1875 he had been made clinical professor of diseases of the nervous system. The last-mentioned charges he still retains. In 1879 he was elected to the National academy of sciences. He was visiting physician of the Philadelphia hospital in 1872-'87, and to St. Agnes's hospital in 1886, and has held the same relation to the University hospital since 1870. He has published "Experimental Researches in the Physiological Action of Nitrite of Amyl," for which he received the Warren prize from the Massachusetts general hospital in 1871; also memoirs on "The Myriapoda of North America" (1865); "On the Phalangidae of North America" (1868); "The Fresh-Water Algae of North America" (1872); and "Fever, a Study in Morbid and Normal Physiology" (1880). The two last-mentioned were issued by the Smithsonian institution. Dr. Wood edited "New Remedies" in 1870-'3; "The Philadelphia Medical Times" in 1873-'80; and since 1884 has conducted "The Therapeutic Gazette." He was also an editor of the "U. S. Dispensatory"

(14th ed., Philadelphia, 1883 et seq.). He has also published "Researches upon American Hemp," for which a special prize was awarded by the American philosophical society; "Thermic Fever, or Sun-stroke" (Philadelphia, 1872), for which he received the Boylston prize from Harvard university in 1872; "Treatise on Materia Medica and Therapeutics" (1875; 7th ed., 1888); "Brain-Work and Over-Work" (1879); and "Nervous Diseases and their Diagnosis" (1886).

WOOD, Isaac, physician, b. in Clinton, Dutchess co., N. Y., 21 Aug., 1793; d. in Norwalk, Conn., 25 March, 1868. In 1803 his father removed to New York city, establishing there a book-store and publishing-house. Isaac studied medicine with Dr. Valentine Seaman, spent the years 1814-'16 in the New York hospital, and in 1816 received his diploma from the medical department of Queen's (now Rutgers) college, N. J. He was one of the physicians of the New York dispensary till 1825, and resident physician of Bellevue hospital from 1826 till 1833, when he resigned. In 1832-'3, during the prevalence of cholera in New York, he kept his post, and was attacked by the disease, from whose effects he did not fully recover for five years. Dr. Wood was an active member of the Society for the reformation of juvenile delinquents, of which his father and elder brother were the principal founders. He was for twenty-five years one of the most active managers of the New York institution for the blind, one of the founders and subsequently president of the Society for the relief of the widows and orphans of physicians, and a founder and twice president of the New York academy of medicine. For many years he was president of the Bellevue hospital medical board, and he was connected with other institutions and societies, including the Sanitary commission during the civil war. He had a high reputation as an ophthalmic surgeon.

WOOD, James, governor of Virginia, b. in 1750; d. at Olney, near Richmond, Va., 16 July, 1813. His father, Col. James Wood, was the founder of Winchester, Va., and clerk of Frederick county. In 1774 the son was commissioned by Lord Dunmore a captain of Virginia troops, and in 1775 he was elected to the house of burgesses from Frederick county. In July of that year he went on a mission from the state of Virginia to the western Indians, accompanied by a single companion, to invite them to a treaty at Fort Pitt. The courage that he displayed on this mission won the admiration of the savages, and he accomplished his object. The house of burgesses, of which he was a member in 1776, appointed him on 12 Nov., 1776, a colonel in the Virginia line, commanding the 8th regiment. He served with gallantry during the early part of the Revolutionary war. When Burgoyne's captured army was quartered at Charlottesville, Va., in 1778, Col. Wood was appointed to the command of that post. In 1781 he was made superintendent of all the prisoners of war in Virginia, and in 1783 the governor of the state commissioned him a brigadier-general of state troops. He was also for several years a member of the Virginia council, and by seniority in that body the lieutenant-governor of the state. In 1789 he was one of the presidential electors for Virginia when the vote of that state was cast for George Washington. He was elected governor of Virginia, 1 Dec., 1796, serving until 1 Dec., 1799, when he was succeeded by James Monroe. Wood county (now in West Virginia) was named in honor of his public services, which covered a period of more than twenty-five years. Gov. Wood was the vice-president in 1797, and in 1801 president, of the Society for promoting the abolition of slavery in Virginia. He became a member of the Virginia branch of the Society of the Cincinnati, 9 Oct., 1784, was elected vice-president of the same, 4 Dec., 1789, and became president, 17 Jan., 1802, serving in this office until his death in 1813.—His wife, Jean Moncure, b. in Virginia in 1754; d. in 1823, married Gov. Wood in 1775. She was the daughter of the Rev. John Moncure, a clergyman of the Church of England in Virginia, and a native of the parish of Kinoff, Scotland. She was possessed of much poetic ability, Christian zeal, and loveliness of character. The later years of her life were spent in deeds of Christian benevolence. She was active in organizing the Female humane association of Richmond, which was incorporated in 1811, and was its first president. Many examples of her poetic talent occurred in the publications of her day, and the most elegant verses from her pen were published in a volume entitled "Flowers and Weeds of the Old Dominion" (1859).

WOOD, James, educator, b. in Greenfield, Ulster co., N. Y., 12 July, 1799; d. in Hightstown, Mercer co., N. J., 7 April, 1867. He was graduated at Union college in 1822, and studied at Princeton theological seminary. He preached at Wilkesbarre and Kingston, Pa., in 1825-'6, and, after being ordained in the latter year, he held the joint pastorate of Amsterdam and Veddersburg, N. Y., from 1826 till 1834. The next five years he served as an agent of the board of education of the Presbyterian church, and he was professor in the Theological seminary of the northwest from 1839 till 1851, while that institution was located at Hanover and New Albany, Ind. The following three years he was again an agent of the board of education, and in 1854-'9 he was its associate secretary. In 1859 he became president of Hanover college, Ind., and held the office until 1866, when he resigned to become principal of the Van Rensselaer institute at Hightstown, N. J., a school for the education of the children of missionaries. Dr. Wood took high rank among the clergymen of his denomination. His sound judgment, amiable temper, extensive learning, and great energy made his influence widely felt. In an able work, entitled "Old and New Theology" (1855), he gave the fullest exhibition of the reasons that led to the disruption of the Presbyterian church, and its division into Old and New School, that has ever been published. He received the degree of D. D. from Marion college, Mo., in 1841. In 1864 he was moderator of the general assembly. He is also the author of "A Treatise on Baptism" (1850); "Call to the Sacred Office" (Philadelphia, 1857); "The Best Lesson and Best Time"; "The Gospel Fountain" (1859); and "Grace and Glory" (1860).

WOOD, James Frederic, archbishop, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 April, 1813; d. there, 20 June, 1883. His father, an Englishman who had settled in this country, carried on the business of an importer. The child was sent in his eighth year to his English relatives in Gloucester, where for five years he attended the free-school of St. Mary de Crypt. In his fifteenth year he left Philadelphia for Cincinnati, where he had been appointed clerk in a branch of the U. S. bank, and in 1833 he became teller in the Franklin bank of that city, and in 1836 its cashier. He was received into the Roman Catholic church in April, 1836, by Archbishop Purcell, and a few months later resigned his post in the bank and went to Rome to study for the priesthood. In the College of the propaganda, where he remained nearly seven years, the authorities appointed him prefect of discipline. After his ordination in 1844 he returned to Cincinnati, where he acted as assistant rector in the cathedral for ten years, and in 1854 he was appointed to the pastorate of St. Patrick's. In

James F. Wood

1857 he was consecrated bishop of Gratianopolis in partibus, and afterward he was transferred to Philadelphia, his native city, where he was to act as coadjutor to Bishop Neumann with the right of succession. The Philadelphia diocese at that time had hastily undertaken more than it seemed likely to be able to accomplish, and financial difficulties were producing apathy. Many institutions for religion, education, and benevolence, a magnificent cathedral among the number, had been begun, but their expense, so far cheerfully borne, was beginning to be severely felt by the Roman Catholic population. As a consequence, many of the buildings had been stopped altogether, and the others were advancing in a slow and half-hearted way. But from the moment of Bishop Wood's arrival things began to improve. Instead of waiting for the completion of the cathedral to form its parish, he called a very strong one into instant existence by simply erecting a large but inexpensive cathedral chapel, thus securing immediate and permanent financial aid, which he then gradually augmented by general collections. Bishop Neumann dying in 1860, his successor could devote himself with still greater efficiency to the wants of the diocese. The cathedral was hardly finished in 1864 when the foundation was laid at Overbrook of the Seminary of St. Charles, the cost of which, $500,000, was fully justified by the demands for pastors that were made by new churches. Many other institutions—educational, charitable, or religious—were either auspiciously begun or brought to a successful issue during his administration. He was taken away from his ordinary duties three times by orders to present himself at Rome—in 1862 to assist at the canonization of the Japanese martyrs, in 1867 to celebrate the 1800th anniversary of St. Peter and St. Paul, and in 1869 to take active part at the Vatican council. In 1871, the flourishing state of the diocese making a division necessary, several episcopal districts were formed, over which he was created archbishop in 1875. In 1880 he assisted at the Baltimore provincial council, and in 1882 the twenty-fifth anniversary of his elevation to the bishopric was celebrated enthusiastically. His health was now feeble, yet he allowed himself little or no relaxation from his numerous duties. Among his favorite projects had been that of providing the cathedral with a grand altar, decorating the interior in befitting style, and then paying off the debt. Most of this he had successfully accomplished when death put a sudden end to his labors. He was noted for his knowledge of sanitary laws as applicable to the construction of new buildings, and no Roman Catholic institution was erected without this subject receiving his careful consideration. He was especially hostile to the introduction of political issues from other countries into the United States, and the stand he took on this question sometimes created discontent among his flock.

WOOD, James Rushmore, surgeon, b. in Mamaroneck, Westchester co., N. Y., 14 Sept., 1816; d. in New York city, 4 May, 1882. He was the son of a Quaker merchant. After studying medicine in New York city, and at the Castleton, Vt., medical college, he was graduated at the latter institution in 1834, and appointed demonstrator of anatomy. Soon afterward he began the practice of medicine in his native city, and in 1847 he became a member of the medical board of Bellevue hospital, New York. At that time this institution was a receptacle for lunatics, paupers, criminals, and other victims of a depraved life. The most rudimentary hygienic laws were grossly violated in its management, and the nursing was inefficient and untrustworthy. With the assistance of Morris Franklin, president of the board of aldermen, Dr. Wood set about reforming this state of things, and labored so successfully that he soon reduced the annual death-rate by 600. He also made all the post-mortem examinations, amounting to many hundreds yearly, established Saturday surgical clinics, and founded the Wood prize for the best anatomical dissection. In 1847 Dr. Wood began to collect material, with the intention of founding a museum, and this collection, together with the accumulated specimens of twenty years' practice, he presented in 1856 to the commissioners of public charities and corrections. This, with later additions, constitutes the "Wood museum," which Dr. Willard Parker has styled "the grandest monument ever erected to any surgeon in this country." In 1857 Dr. Wood was mainly instrumental in procuring the passage by the legislature of the dissecting bill, which provided that the bodies of all unclaimed vagrants should be given for dissection to the institutions in which medicine and surgery are taught. It took four years to secure the enactment of this law, and so great was the public prejudice against it that it finally passed by only one majority. In 1861 Dr. Wood, in association with many physicians and surgeons of the metropolis, and under the auspices of the almshouse commissioners, founded Bellevue hospital medical college. The same year he was called to occupy the chair of operative surgery and surgical pathology in that institution, which he held until his death, being made professor emeritus in 1868. Dr. Wood paid especial attention to the bones and their growth, and succeeded in establishing beyond dispute the fact of a second growth of bone by separating the periosteum from the necrosed bone and carefully enucleating it. In his anatomical and pathological museum he had on exhibition an entire jaw that he had removed for phosphor-necrosis, and also a second jaw that had attached itself to the skull of a patient who had been operated upon and had subsequently died of another disease. In fact, he had specimens to show the reproduction of almost every bone in the human body. Among his other successful operations were the tying of both carotids in the same patient for malignant disease of the antrum, placing the ligature on the subclavian on several occasions, and tying the external iliac artery. Dr. Wood was also surgeon to St. Vincent's hospital and to the New York ophthalmic dispensary. He was a member of many medical and other learned associations, and twice president of the New York pathological society. Besides papers on "Strangulated Hernia" (1845), "Spontaneous Dislocation of the Head of the Femur into the Ischiatic Notch" (1847), and an essay on "Medical Education" (1848), he published "Ligature of the External Iliac Artery followed by Secondary Hæmorrhage" and "Phosphor-Necrosis of the Lower Jaw" (1856), and "Early History of Ligation of the Primitive Carotid."

WOOD, John, author, b. in Scotland about 1775; d. in Richmond, Va., in May, 1822. He was residing in Switzerland in 1798 at the time of the French invasion. On returning home, he became in the following year master of the Edinburgh academy for the improvement of arts in Scotland. About 1800 he emigrated to the United States. In 1806 he edited the "Western World" in Kentucky, and in 1817 he had charge of "The Atlantic World," a paper published at Washington, D. C. He subsequently resided at Richmond, Va., where he was employed in making county maps. He published, besides other works, "General View of the History of Switzerland" (Edinburgh, 1799); "Letter to A. Addison, Esq., in Answer to his 'Rise and Progress of Revolution'" (Philadelphia, 1801); "Full Exposition of the Clintonian Faction, and the Society of the Columbian Illuminati" (Newark, 1802); "History of the Administration of John Adams" (New York, 1802; suppressed by Aaron Burr; new ed., with notes and appendix by John Henry Sherburne, Philadelphia, 1846); "Narrative of the Suppression, by Col. Burr, of the 'History of the Administration of John Adams,' with a Biography of Jefferson and Hamilton" (1802); "Full Statement of the Trial and Acquittal of Aaron Burr" (Alexandria, 1807); and "New Theory of the Diurnal Rotation of the Earth" (Richmond, 1809). Of the "History of the Administration of John Adams" James Parton, in his "Life of Aaron Burr," says: "Stupidity, Ignorance, and Falsehood combined their several powers in the production of this indigested mass of tedious lies." Mr. Wood's statements were also traversed in "Antidote to John Wood's Poison" (Philadelphia, 1802).

WOOD, John, pioneer, b. in Moravia, Cayuga co., N. Y., 20 Dec., 1798; d. in Quincy, Ill., 4 June, 1880. He emigrated to Illinois in 1819, and in 1822 built the first cabin on the site of the present city of Quincy, living in it alone during one winter. In 1825 he secured the laying out of Adams county, of which Quincy is the county-seat. For the succeeding sixty years he was the foremost figure in all matters relating to the city that he founded and made his home. He served as town trustee from 1834 till 1840, was many times alderman, and seven times mayor. In 1850 he was elected to the state senate, where he sat till 1854. In 1856 he was elected lieutenant-governor, and he succeeded to the governorship in 1859. He had enlisted in the Black Hawk war in 1832, and at the beginning of the civil war he was appointed quartermaster-general of Illinois. In 1861 he was sent as a delegate to the Peace conference at Washington, and in 1864 was elected colonel of the 137th Illinois volunteers. Gov. Wood was one of the few men who, from the outset, comprehended the scope of the coming struggle. On being questioned by Gov. Richard J. Oglesby as to whether a call for 75,000 men for three months' service would be sufficient, he replied: "I know these people, their attachment to slavery, and the deep feeling that actuates them. . . . They will fight long and desperately. What we want, and want now, and must have, for it will take it all—I know it will—is 500,000 men and $500,000,000." After taking the field, Col. Wood was placed in command of a brigade at Memphis, where he was stationed at the time of Gen. Nathan B. Forrest's raid on that city. As quartermaster-general he made frequent visits to the armies both in Virginia and in the southwest, giving personal attention to the wants of the various Illinois regiments. He was strongly anti-slavery in sentiment, and more than any one man in northwestern Illinois is said to have contributed to the casting of the vote in that region against the slave-state scheme of the convention of 1824. His townsmen dedicated a monument to his memory on 4 July, 1883.

WOOD, Joseph, patriot, b. in Pennsylvania; d. in Sunbury, Ga., in 1789. During the early part of the Revolutionary war he saw service with the 2d Pennsylvania regiment and rose to the rank of colonel. In 1776 he was on duty in Canada. Toward the close of that year he removed to Georgia and settled in St. John's parish (afterward Liberty county), where he became a planter and was elected a member of the council of safety. In 1777-'9 Col. Wood represented Georgia in the Continental congress, for which he was placed on the list of citizens that were disqualified by act of the Tory general assembly of the state on 6 July, 1780, during the British occupation. In this document he is stigmatized as a "member of the rebel congress." Col. Wood was a man of unblemished character and held in high esteem by his fellow-citizens.

WOOD, Reuben, lawyer, b. in Rutland county, Vt., in 1792; d. in Rockport, Cuyahoga co., Ohio, 2 Oct., 1864. He served in the war of 1812 as captain of Vermont volunteers, and, after studying law and being admitted to the bar, began to practise in Cleveland, Ohio. From 1825 till 1828 he was a member of the state senate. In 1830 he was appointed president-judge of the 3d district, and in 1833 he became judge of the state supreme court, which office he held until 1845. In 1849 he was elected governor by the Democrats, and he was re-elected in 1850, when the new constitution went into effect. In 1852 the Democratic national convention discussed the nomination of Gov. Wood for the presidency, but finally united upon Franklin Pierce. In 1853 he was appointed U. S. consul at Valparaiso, and he resided there eighteen months, when he resigned and retired from public life.

WOOD, Samuel Casey, Canadian merchant, b. in Bath, Lennox co., Ont., 27 Dec., 1830. His father, Thomas Smith Wood, was formerly of Saratoga Springs, N. Y. The son was educated at various common schools, and taught three years, when he embarked in trade, taking a situation in a country store. Later he opened an establishment on his own account in Mariposa, Victoria co., and subsequently became clerk of the township council. From 1860 till 1876 he held the post of county clerk and county treasurer. He was chairman of the high-school board in Lindsay, Ont., and was the representative of the public-school inspectors in the council of public instruction. On 25 Feb., 1871, he entered the legislative assembly of Ontario, in the Liberal interest, as member for South Victoria, and the premier, Oliver Mowat, invited him in July, 1875, to enter his government as secretary, registrar, and commissioner of agriculture. In March, 1877, on a readjustment of the portfolios, he assumed the departments of finance and agriculture. In March, 1883, he retired from public life altogether. He was chairman of the Ontario agricultural commission of 1881, and two years later accepted the office of manager of the Freehold loan and savings company.

WOOD, Silas, legislator, b. in Suffolk county, N. Y., in 1769; d. in Huntington, N. Y., 2 March, 1847. He was graduated at Princeton in 1789, and during the succeeding five years was a tutor there. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice at Huntington, N. Y. He was afterward elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 6 Dec., 1819, till 3 March, 1829. He is the author of "Sketch of the First Settlement of the Several Towns on Long Island, with their Political Condition to the End of the American Revolution" (Brooklyn, 1824; with a biographical memoir and additions by Alden J. Spooner, 1865).

WOOD, Thomas John, soldier, b. in Munfordville, Ky., 25 Sept., 1823. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1845, assigned to the topographical engineers, and then transferred, at his own request, to the 2d dragoons, becoming a 2d lieutenant there on 2 Dec., 1846. He took part in the war with Mexico, being present at the battles of Palo Alto, Monterey, and Buena Vista, served subsequently in Louisiana and Texas, as aide-de-camp to Gen. William S. Harney in 1848-'9, and as adjutant of the 2d dragoons till 1854. He was promoted in succession to 1st lieutenant in 1851, and to captain in the 1st cavalry in 1855, serving in Kansas during the border troubles and on the Utah expedition under Albert Sidney Johnston till 1859. He became major, 16 March, and lieutenant-colonel, 9 May, 1861, and in October of the same year was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers and placed in command of a division in the Tennessee and Mississippi campaigns, taking part in the battle of Shiloh and the siege of Corinth. During the remainder of the year he was engaged in guarding railroads in Alabama and Tennessee, in Gen. Don Carlos Buell's operations in Kentucky, the pursuit of Gen. Braxton Bragg's forces, and in the battle of Stone River, 31 Dec., 1862, where he was wounded. He commanded a division in the 21st corps, Army of the Cumberland, during the operations in Tennessee, being present at the battles of Chickamauga and Mission Ridge, till November, 1863, and was engaged in operations for the relief of Knoxville and the invasion of Georgia, including the principal battles, to the action of Lovejoy's Station in September, 1864, where he was severely wounded. Gen. Wood took an active part in the battles of Franklin and Nashville, where he commanded the 4th corps, and in the pursuit of the enemy to Tennessee river in December, 1864. He was promoted major-general of volunteers in January, 1865, and commanded various districts and departments in Tennessee, Texas, Arkansas, and Mississippi until he was mustered out of the volunteer service, 1 Sept., 1866. Gen. Wood received the brevet of 1st lieutenant, U. S. army, for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Buena Vista, that of brigadier-general for Chickamauga, and major-general for Nashville. He was promoted colonel of the 2d cavalry, 12 Nov., 1861, and retired from service, with the rank of major-general, 9 June, 1868, and that of brigadier-general, 3 March, 1871.

WOOD, Thomas Waterman, artist, b. in Montpelier, Vt., 12 Nov., 1823. He studied portrait-painting with Chester Harding in Boston during 1846-'7, and executed likenesses in Quebec, Washington, and Baltimore until 1858. In that year he went abroad for further study, remaining about two years. After his return he was engaged in portrait-painting in Nashville, Tenn., and Louisville, Ky., until 1866. He then removed to New York, where he has since resided. He soon devoted himself almost entirely to genre painting, in which he has chosen familiar subjects in American life. Mr. Wood became vice-president of the National academy in 1878, and from 1878 till 1887 was president of the Water-color society. He was one of the founders, in 1878, of the New York etching club, and is a regular contributor to its exhibitions, most of his etchings being after his own paintings. His three paintings, "The Contraband," "Recruit," and "Veteran," exhibited at the Academy of design in 1867, gained him his election as associate the following year, and in 1871 he became an academician. These three pictures now belong to the Metropolitan museum, New York. Among his other works in oil are "Return of the Flag" (1870); "The Yankee Peddler" (1873); "The Village Post-Office" (1874); "His own Doctor" and "His own Pipe" (1879); and "Uncle Ned and I" (1882). At the Water-color society he has exhibited "Nominated" and "Elected" (1875); "Arguing the Question" (1877); "Dull Times" (1879); "The Doubtful Coin" and "The Cup that Cheers" (1881); "Seeking Advice" (1882); "His First Business Venture" (1884); "For Thanksgiving-Day" (1885); "The Lost Stitch" (1886); and "When we were Boys Together" (1888).

WOOD, Walter Abbott, inventor, b. in Mason, N. H., 23 Oct., 1815. He is the son of Aaron Wood, who early settled in New York state and was among the first to manufacture the cast-iron ploughs invented by Jethro Wood. The boy had a natural fondness for mechanics, and continued in his father's shops till he was twenty years old. In 1835 he settled in Hoosick Falls, N. Y., where he entered the works of Parsons and Wilder, and, after acquiring a small capital, began business on his own account. He studied the mechanism of farming-implements and soon introduced the Manny harvesting-machine with Wood's improvements, of which in 1852 he made and sold nearly 200. Mr. Wood continued to improve and invent better forms of mowers and reapers, and in 1853 his sales amounted to 500 machines. These were so well received that he determined to increase his works and manufacture on as large a scale as possible. In 1869 he disposed of 6,000 machines, and in 1884 of 48,300. In all, nearly 600,000 machines have been manufactured and sold by him since he established his business. About thirty patents have been taken out by Mr. Wood, and his works are probably the most extensive of their kind in the world. He conducted his business alone until 1866, when it was organized into a stock company called the Walter A. Wood mowing and reaping company, of which Mr. Wood has since been president. Mr. Wood early recognized the importance of furnishing the markets abroad with his machines, and his foreign sales have steadily increased until it is estimated that ninety per cent. of the machines that are sold abroad are made by him. The value of his inventions has been recognized by the award of first prizes at the World's fairs in Paris in 1867, in Vienna in 1873, in Philadelphia in 1876, and in Paris in 1878, as well as by medals at local fairs. He has received the order of Francis Joseph from the Austrian government, and is an officer of the Legion of honor in France. In 1878 he was sent as a Republican to congress, and he served from 18 March, 1879, till 4 March, 1883.

WOOD, William, colonist, b. in England about 1580; d. in Sandwich, Mass., in 1639. He emigrated to this country in 1629, and returned to England in 1633. He soon afterward sailed again for Massachusetts, and settled at Lynn, which town he represented in the general court in 1636. He removed to Sandwich the following year, became town-clerk, and resided there until his death. After his return to London he published "New England's Prospect," the first printed account of Massachusetts, and styled it "A True, Lively, and Experimentall Description of that part of America commonly called New England; discovering the State of that Countrie, both as it stands to our New-Come English Planters and to the old Native Inhabitants; Laying downe that which may both enrich the Knowledge of the Mind-travelling Reader, or benefit the future Voyager" (1634). The perfect copies are enriched with a curious map of the country, and the text is interspersed with rhymed descriptions of natural history that strongly resemble those of Spenser. The "Prospect" was republished with an "Introductory Essay," which is ascribed to James Otis (Boston, 1764), and again by the Prince society (1865).

WOOD, William, publisher, b. on Long Island in April, 1797; d. in New York city, 9 April, 1877. In 1822 he became a member of the publishing-firm of Samuel Wood and Sons, which his father, Samuel Wood, an English Quaker, had established in New York city. This house did a large jobbing trade in books and stationery, and early became noted for the publication of juvenile books. Soon after the admission of William Wood he turned his attention to publishing medical books, which has become the leading business of the house. He also began the publication of the "Medical Record" and the "American Journal of Obstetrics." Mr. Wood was a member of the Society of Friends, and held the chief executive office of the society for the state of New York for many years.

WOOD, William Burke, actor, b. in Montreal, Can., 26 May, 1779; d. in Philadelphia, 23 Sept., 1861. He was brought in childhood to New York city, where he began life as a clerk. Feeling that he had a vocation for the stage, he set out for Annapolis, Md., with a capital of three doubloons, and through the courtesy of Manager Wignell, an old family friend, he made his first appearance there on 26 June, 1798, as George Barnwell. He was partially successful, and began an engagement the same year in Philadelphia in "Secrets Worth Knowing." On 30 Jan., 1804, he married Juliana Westray, an actress, and in the autumn of 1809 he purchased of William Warren one half of his interest in the Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington theatres. Previous to entering upon the duties of management he visited New York city and played De Valmont. In the autumn of 1810 he began his career as manager in Baltimore, and from September, 1812, till the close of the season of 1820, he divided his time between that city and Philadelphia, where his company played at the Chestnut street theatre. On 2 April, 1820, the latter edifice was destroyed by fire, and, as the insurance had expired a few days before, the loss was heavy. Having secured a lease of the Walnut street theatre, the Warren-Wood company began to play again in Philadelphia the following November. On the 27th of that month Master Edwin Forrest made his first appearance there on any stage in "Douglas." The Chestnut street theatre having been rebuilt, it was opened by the same managers on 2 Dec., 1822, with the "School for Scandal," Warren playing Sir Peter Teazle, and Wood, Charles Surface. In 1826 the sixteen years' partnership between the two managers was terminated by the withdrawal of Mr. Wood. On 1 Oct., 1828, the latter undertook the management of the Arch street theatre, Philadelphia, then just built; but the enterprise was not successful, and the rest of his theatrical career was divided between management and acting in the same city. He retired finally from the stage, 18 Nov., 1846, on the occasion of a benefit at the Walnut street theatre. For an account of his career, and much information regarding the American stage, see his "Personal Recollections of the Stage" (Philadelphia, 1855).—His wife, Juliana, whose maiden name was West-ray, first appeared at the Haymarket theatre, Boston, in 1797. The following year she came to New York, where she made her début at the Park as Sarsnet in "The Deserted Daughter." She soon after joined the company in which Mr. Wood was playing, and after her marriage continued to act in the theatres that he managed.

WOOD, William Maxwell, surgeon, b. in Baltimore, Md., 27 May, 1809; d. in Owing's Mills, Baltimore co., Md., 1 March, 1880. He entered the navy as an assistant surgeon, 10 May, 1829, became a passed assistant surgeon, 1 Jan., 1835, and was commissioned surgeon, 20 Feb., 1838. He served on the steamer "Poinsett" on the coast of Florida during the Seminole war in 1838-'41, was appointed fleet-surgeon of the Pacific squadron in 1843, and brought the first intelligence of the opening of the Mexican war from Guadalajara to Mazatlan to Com. Sloat. This information induced the commodore to go immediately to California, when he captured Monterey and began the operations which resulted in the conquest of the state. He was fleet-surgeon of the East India squadron in 1856-'8 and present at the capture of the Barrier forts in Canton river, China. He was fleet-surgeon of the North Atlantic blockading squadron in the flag-ship "Minnesota" in 1861-'4, and was present at the capture of the forts at Hatteras inlet, 28 Aug., 1861, in the engagements with the "Merrimac," 8-9 March, 1862, at the capture of Sewall's point and Norfolk in May, 1862, in the sounds of North Carolina in 1863, and on blockade and other operations on the coast in 1863-'5. On 1 July, 1869, he was appointed surgeon-general of the navy and chief of the bureau of medicine and surgery, in which he served until 24 Oct., 1871, though he was retired by operation of law on 27 May, 1871. He was commissioned a medical director, 3 March, 1871, and resided at Owing's Mills, Baltimore co., Md., until his death. Dr. Wood was the author of "Wandering Sketches of People and Things in South America, Polynesia, California, and Other Places visited during a Cruise in the U. S. ships 'Levant,' 'Portsmouth,' and 'Savannah'" (Philadelphia, 1849); "A Shoulder to the Wheel of Progress" (New York, 1849); "Hints to the People on the Profession of Medicine" (Buffalo, 1852); and "Fankwei, or the 'San Jacinto' in the Seas of India, China, and Japan" (New York, 1859).—His son, William Maxwell, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 9 March, 1850, was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1870, was promoted to master, 9 Aug., 1874, and to lieutenant, 11 Dec., 1877. He has patented a boat-detaching apparatus (1871), which has been adopted in the U. S. navy and merchant service, and is the author of the article on "Life-Boats and Boat-detaching Apparatus" in Hamersly's "Naval Cyclopædia" (Philadelphia, 1881).

WOOD, William Willis Wiley, naval engineer, b. in Wake county, N. C., 30 May, 1818; d. near Jutland, St. Mary's co., Md., 31 Aug., 1882. He acquired a knowledge of engineering at the West Point foundry, N. Y., entered the navy as a chief engineer, 15 March, 1845, and superintended the construction of the boilers and engines of the steam frigate "Merrimac" in 1854-'7 at Cold Spring, N. Y. During the civil war he rendered valuable services on special duty connected with the steam-engineering service at the navy-yards in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. He was head of the department of steam engineering at the naval academy in 1866-'7, chief engineer of the New York navy-yard in 1868-'9, inspector of machinery afloat in 1870-'2, chief of the bureau of steam engineering from 1872 till 3 March, 1877, and on special duty at Washington until 30 May, 1880, when he was placed on the retired list. He was one of the pioneers in the U. S. steam navy, and held the relative rank of commodore when he was retired as he had served as engineer-in-chief. He was drowned in a boat capsized by a squall.

WOODBERRY, George Edward, author, b. in Beverly, Mass., 12 May, 1855. He was graduated at Harvard in 1877, and was professor of English in the University of Nebraska in 1877-'8 and 1880-'2. He was connected editorially with the "Nation," in 1878-'9, and is the author of a "History of Wood-Engraving" (New York, 1883); "The North Shore Watch, a Threnody" (printed privately, 1883); and "Life of Edgar Allan Poe," in the "American Men of Letters" series (Boston, 1885).

WOODBIDGE, John, clergyman, b. in Stanton, Wiltshire, England, in 1614; d. in Newbury, Mass., 1 July, 1691. He was the son of the Rev. John Woodbridge, rector of the parish of Stanton, Wiltshire, whose earliest known ancestor was John Woodbridge, born about 1492, and was sent to Oxford, where he remained "until the oath of conformity came to be required of him, which neither his father nor his conscience approving, he removed thence into a course of more private studies." In 1634 he came to New England in the ship "Mary and John" with his uncle, the Rev. Thomas Parker, and settled in Newbury, Mass., of which he was town-clerk in 1634-'8, and surveyor of arms in 1637. In 1639 he married Mercy, the daughter of Gov. Thomas Dudley, and in 1643 taught in Boston. With others he negotiated the purchase from the Indians of the land on which the town of Andover was built; he was chosen the first minister of the place, his ordination, on 24 Oct., 1645, being one of the earliest in New England. In 1647 he returned to England, became chaplain to the parliamentary commissioners who made a treaty with the king at the Isle of Wight, and was afterward minister at Andover, Hants, and at Barford-St. Martin's, Wiltshire, until he was ejected after the Restoration. In 1663 he was driven from a school that he had established in Newbury, England, and returned to New England. He then served as assistant to the Rev. Thomas Parker until 30 Nov., 1670, when he was dismissed in consequence of dissensions in the church. Subsequently he held other local offices, and was an assistant of Massachusetts colony in 1683-'4. Cotton Mather, in his "Magnalia," speaks of his excellence and piety. His memory is preserved in the name of Woodbridge island, near the mouth of Merrimac river. He is the progenitor of all the American Woodbridges.—His brother, Benjamin, clergyman, b. in Stanton, Wiltshire, England, in 1622; d. in Inglefield, Berks, England, 1 Nov., 1684, was graduated at Oxford in 1638, came to New England in 1639, and, entering Harvard, was the first graduate of that university. After his return to England with his brother in 1647 he became minister at Newbury,

Berks, but was ejected in 1662. Being a favorite of the king, he was permitted to preach privately. He was a member of the Savoy conference and for a time was chaplain to Charles II. He received episcopal ordination after the Restoration, but subsequently became a non-conformist. He was called "the first fruits of the college of New England," and left the reputation of being a "universally accomplished person, of a clear and strong reason, and of an exact and profound judgment." He published several sermons, including "Justification by Faith" (London, 1652); "The Method of Grace in the Justification of Sinners" (1656); and "Church Members set in Joynt" (1656).—John's son, Timothy, clergyman, b. in Barford-St. Martin's, Wilts, England, 13 Jan., 1656; d. in Hartford, Conn., 30 April, 1732, was graduated at Harvard in 1675, and became minister of the 1st church in Hartford, Conn., in 1683, but was not ordained until 1685. He introduced infant baptism into Connecticut in 1696, and was one of the ten principal ministers of Connecticut colony that were named as trustees and authorized by the general assembly of Connecticut to found Yale college in 1699, and was a fellow of that college in 1700-'32. He was an active member of the Saybrook convention in 1708, and served the colony in many important political affairs. He published an election sermon (1727) and occasional poems.—Another son, Benjamin, clergyman, b. in Medford, Mass., 15 Jan., 1710, was minister of Bristol and of Kittery, Me., in 1645. He wrote the ingenious lines for the tomb of Cotton Mather. His brother John was minister of Wethersfield, Conn., and died in 1791; and for eight generations one of his descendants always bore the name of John and followed the same profession.—The second Benjamin's grandson, Benjamin, merchant, b. in 1709; d. in Boston, Mass., 3 July, 1728, was the son of Gov. Dudley Woodbridge, of Barbadoes. He received a good education in Boston and became a partner of Jonathan Sewall, son of the chief justice. On 3 July, 1728, he fought a duel with swords with Henry Phillips, without seconds and at night, on Boston common, and was killed. Phillips escaped to France. The motive for the duel is not known. It caused great sensation, and severe laws against duelling were enacted. The "Overland Monthly" for October, 1874, gives an account of it.—John's descendant in the fifth generation, Timothy, clergyman, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 23 Nov., 1784; d. in Spencertown, Columbia co., N. Y., 7 Dec., 1862, was the son of Jahleel (1738-'96), who was graduated at Princeton in 1761, and served in the state senate and as judge of probate in Stockbridge, Mass., from 1789 till 1795, and of Lucy, daughter of Jonathan Edwards. The son entered Williams college in 1799, but during his sophomore year lost his eyesight, and passed the remainder of his life in total blindness. After graduation in 1803 he studied law, but abandoned this to enter Andover theological seminary in 1810, and was graduated there in 1811. In 1816 he became pastor of the Presbyterian church in Green River, Columbia co., N. Y., remaining there until 1842, when he was called to the Presbyterian church in Spencertown, and held this charge until 1851. In 1852-'3 he served as pastor of a Congregational church in Alford, Mass., and he then returned to Spencertown, where he devoted his life to charity, preaching only occasionally. He was known as the "blind minister"; but, notwithstanding his infirmity, he was very active and cheerful, a hard student, and an interesting preacher. In his method of conducting religious worship there was nothing to indicate his blindness; the hymns and parts of the scripture, though really repeated, were apparently read. In the vigor of his logic and the clearness of his descriptions he strongly resembled his distinguished ancestor. Williams gave him the degree of D. D. in 1846. See "The Autobiography of a Blind Minister, including Sketches of the Men and Events of his Time" (Boston, 1856), and a "Discourse at the Funeral of the Rev. Timothy Woodbridge," by William B. Sprague, D. D. (Albany, 1863).—John's descendant in the fifth generation, William, governor of Michigan, b. in Norwich, Conn., 20 Aug., 1780; d. in Detroit, Mich., 20 Oct., 1861, removed with his father, Dudley (1747–1823), one of the earliest emigrants, to the Northwest territory, to Marietta, Ohio, in 1791, but was sent to Connecticut to receive his education. After studying at the Litchfield law-school, he was admitted to the bar of Ohio in 1806, and in 1807 was elected to the assembly. From 1808 till 1814 he was prosecuting attorney for New London county, Ohio, and he was also a member of the state senate. In 1814 he received from President Madison the appointment of secretary of the territory of Michigan, and removed to Detroit. For a long time he was legal adviser of John Jacob Astor's northwest fur company, and was counsel in important Canadian cases against the Hudson bay company. He was elected the first delegate to congress from Michigan, serving from 1819 till 1820, when he resigned. He was instrumental in procuring government aid toward constructing a road through the "Black Swamp" to connect Detroit with Ohio, and also toward exploration of the Northwest territory. From 1828 till 1832 he was judge of the superior court of Michigan territory, and in 1835 he was a delegate to the State constitutional convention. He was elected to the state senate in 1837, was governor of Michigan in 1840–'1, and, being chosen to the U. S. senate, served from 31 May, 1841, till 3 March, 1847. Daniel Webster, in a note to his speech in defence of the Ashburton treaty, attributed to Mr.

H. M. Woodbridge

Woodbridge the first suggestion that was ever made to him for inserting in that treaty a provision for the surrender of fugitives under certain circumstances, upon the demand of foreign governments. For many years before his death he lived at his country-seat near Detroit, and devoted himself to his books and to horticulture. He married Juliana, daughter of John Trumbull, author of "McFingal." See his "Life," by Charles Lanman (Washington, 1867).—The first Timothy's great-grandson, William Channing, educator, b. in Medford, Mass., 18 Dec., 1794; d. in Boston, Mass., 9 Nov., 1845, was graduated at Yale in 1811, and studied medicine and theology, but was never ordained. In 1812–'14 he was principal of the Burlington academy, N. J., and in 1817 he became an instructor in the institution for the deaf and dumb in Hartford, Conn., remaining there for three years, and being licensed to preach by the Congregational association of that city. He then visited Europe three times, and on his return devoted himself to elevating the condition of the common schools, and introduced the Pestalozzian system of instruction as modified by Philip Emanuel von Fellenberg, and by his own observations. In August, 1831, he purchased the "American Journal of Education," changed its name to "The Annals of Education," and published it until 1838, serving also as one of its editors. In this appeared a series of "Letters from Hofwyl," in which he gave an account of Fellenberg's system of instruction. He published "Universal Geography, Ancient and Modern," with Mrs. Emma Willard (Hartford, 1824), and was the author of "Rudiments of Geography" (Hartford, 1833); "Modern School Geography"; and other text-books for schools.—John's descendant in the seventh generation, Samuel Merrill, clergyman, b. in Greenfield, Mass., 5 April, 1819, was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1838 and at the theological seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., in 1842, and became pastor of the Dutch Reformed churches in South Brooklyn in 1841, in Cossackie, N. Y., in 1850, and in New Brunswick, N. J., in 1852. From 1857 till 1864 he was professor of ecclesiastical history and church government, and dean of the theological seminary of the Reformed church in New Brunswick, and also professor of church history there after 1856. He received the degrees of D. D. from Rutgers in 1857 and Union in 1858, and LL. D. from Rutgers in 1883. Besides addresses and sermons, he has published an "Analysis of Theology" (New York, 1872).—John's descendant in the eighth generation, Frederick Enoch, lawyer, b. in Vergennes, Vt., 29 Aug., 1819; d. there, 26 April, 1888, after graduation at the University of Vermont in 1840, studied law under his father, Enoch D. Woodbridge, was admitted to the bar in 1842, and practised in his native town. He was long a member of the legislature, state auditor in 1850–'2, prosecuting attorney in 1854–'8, and many times mayor of his native city. In 1860–'2 he served in the state senate, of which he was president pro tempore in 1861. He was then elected to congress as a Republican, served from 7 Dec., 1863, till 3 March, 1869, and was a member of the committees on the judiciary and private land-claims, and chairman of that on the pay of officials of congress. He was a delegate to the Philadelphia loyalists' convention of 1866. Mr. Woodbridge engaged in railroad enterprises, and for several years was vice-president and active manager of the Rutland and Washington railroad.—John's descendant, in the 7th generation, Abby Dwight, b. in Jackson, Me., 27 Sept., 1808; d. 23 Feb., 1866, taught for many years in Albany and Brooklyn, and was the author of numerous poems.

WOODBURY, Augustus, author, b. in Beverly, Mass., in 1825. He was graduated at Phillips Exeter academy in 1846, and at the divinity-school of Harvard in 1849, and became pastor of Unitarian churches in Concord, N. H., in 1849, in Lowell, Mass., in 1853, and of Westminster Unitarian church, Providence, R. I., which place he still holds. He was chairman of inspectors of the Rhode Island state prison in 1866–'77, and in 1875–'9 was a member of the commission for building the state prison. He was chaplain of the 1st Rhode Island regiment from April till August, 1861, and in 1874–'5 was chaplain-in-chief of the Grand army of the republic. Since 1883 he has been president of the Providence athenæum. Harvard gave him the degree of A. M. in 1866, and Brown that of D. D. in 1888. He is the author of

"Plain Words to Young Men" (Concord, 1858); "The Preservation of the Republic," an oration (Providence, 1860); "Narrative of the Campaign of the First Rhode Island Regiment in the Spring and Summer of 1861" (1862); "General Ambrose E. Burnside and the Ninth Army Corps" (1867); "The Second Rhode Island Regiment" (1875); "An Historical Sketch of the Prisons and Jails of Rhode Island" (1877); "Memorial of Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside" (1882); and sermons, addresses, and articles in reviews.

WOODBURY, Daniel Phineas, soldier, b. in New London, N. H., 16 Dec., 1812; d. in Key West, Fla., 15 Aug., 1864. He was educated at private schools and at the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated in 1836 and promoted to be 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery. In November of the same year he was transferred to the engineers, but the order was inoperative until July, 1837, when he was made brevet 2d lieutenant of engineers, to date from 1 July, 1836. He was engaged in the construction of the Cumberland road in Ohio till 1840, being promoted 1st lieutenant, 7 July, 1838, and was then on duty till 1847, repairing fortifications at points on the Atlantic coast, and as an assistant to the chief of engineers at Washington. Lieut. Woodbury was superintending engineer in the construction of Fort Kearny and Fort Laramie for the protection of the Oregon route till 1850, and on fortification duty on the North Carolina coast until 1856, becoming captain of engineers, 3 March, 1853. Thereafter, until the civil war, he was constantly engaged in the duties of his corps on the southern coast, and as an assistant to the chief of engineers. He was promoted major of engineers, 6 Aug., 1861, assisted in the construction of the defences of Washington, and was with Gen. David Hunter's column at Bull Run. He was made lieutenant-colonel and additional aide-de-camp in September, 1861, and brigadier-general of volunteers, 19 March, 1862, and was assigned to command the engineer brigade in the Army of the Potomac, where he rendered great service in the siege of Yorktown and the construction of roads, bridges, and causeways for the advance upon Richmond and the subsequent change of base to James river. In the Rappahannock campaign of 1862-'3 Gen. Woodbury distinguished himself at Fredericksburg in laying down pontoons under the enemy's fire, and in their prompt removal after the troops had recrossed the river. In March, 1863, he was placed in command of the District of Key West, where he died of yellow fever. He was brevetted to the grade of major-general in the United States army "for gallant and meritorious services during the rebellion," especially on the peninsula in 1862 and at the battle of Fredericksburg. Gen. Woodbury was the author of works on "Sustaining Walls" (Washington, 1845), and the "Theory of the Arch" (New York, 1858).

WOODBURY, Isaac Baker, editor, b. in Beverly, Mass., in 1819; d. in Columbia, S. C., 26 Oct., 1858. He studied music in Europe for a year, and, returning to this country, taught it in the public schools of Boston. In 1845 he removed to New York, where he edited the "Musical Review" and the "Musical Pioneer." He compiled several collections of church music and glee-books, among which were the "Anthem Dulcimer" (New York, 1850); "Liber Musicus" (1851); "Million's Glee-Book" (1853); "Cultivation of the Voice Without a Master"; "Self-Instructor in Musical Composition and Thorough Bass"; "Singing-School and Music-Teacher's Companion"; and the "Melodeon and Seraphine Instruction-Book."

WOODBURY, Levi, jurist, b. in Francestown, N. H., 22 Dec., 1789; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 4 Sept., 1851. He was descended from John Woodbury, of Somersetshire, England, who settled first at Cape Ann in 1624, and at Naumkeag (now Salem) in 1626. After graduation with the highest honors at Dartmouth in 1809, Levi entered the Litchfield, Conn., law-school. He was admitted to the bar in 1812, and practised in his native town until 1816, when he was chosen clerk of the state senate. In 1817 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of the state, and in 1819 removed to Portsmouth, where he practised law after serving as governor of New Hampshire in 1823-'4. He was speaker of the state house of representatives in 1825, and was elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, serving from 5 Dec., 1825, till 3 March, 1831, when he was appointed secretary of the navy, and held that office until 1834, when he was made secretary of the treasury, serving until 1841. During this period he refused the post of chief justice of the New Hampshire superior court. Being elected again to the U. S. senate, he served from 4 March, 1841, till 20 Nov., 1845, and voted in 1844 for the annexation of Texas. In 1845 he declined the mission to England, and was appointed a justice of the U. S. supreme court to succeed Judge Joseph Story. His nomination was confirmed by the senate on 3 Jan., 1846, and he held this office at the time of his death. For his part in the celebrated senate debate on Samuel A. Foote's resolutions "on the public lands" in 1830 he was pronounced by Thomas H. Benton "the rock of the New England Democracy," and he was also conspicuous in the session of 1841 in defending the independent treasury system, which was first established under his administration of the department, and in defeating the banking system that was proposed by Henry Clay. He published discourses, and was co-editor with William M. Richardson of several volumes of the "New Hampshire Reports" (Concord, 1816 et seq.). After his death appeared "The Writings of Hon. Levi Woodbury, Political, Judicial, and Literary," selected and arranged by Nahum Capen (3 vols., Boston, 1852).—His son, Charles Levi, lawyer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 22 May, 1820, was a member of the Suffolk, Mass., bar, and U. S. district attorney for Massachusetts from 1858 until 1861. He edited with George Minot "Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Circuit Court of the United States for the First Circuit," containing the decisions of Judge Levi Woodbury (3 vols., Boston, 1847-'52).

WOODFORD, Stewart Lyndon, lawyer, b. in New York city, 3 Sept., 1835. He studied at Yale and at Columbia, where he was graduated in 1854, and in 1857 began the practice of law in his native city. In 1860 he was chosen messenger of the electoral college of his state to convey to Washington its vote in favor of the presidency of Abraham Lincoln. In 1861 he was appointed U. S. assistant district attorney for the southern district of New York, holding this office about eighteen months. In 1862 he entered the National army as a volunteer, serving until 1865, during which time he became in succession chief-of-staff to Gen. Quincy A. Gillmore in the Department of the South, and military commandant of Charleston and Savannah, and attained by brevet the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers. From 1866 till 1868 he was lieutenant-governor of New York, having been chosen as a Republican, but he was defeated as candidate for the governorship in 1870. In 1872 he was elected to congress, and was also chosen as a presidential elector. From 1877 until 1883 he filled the office of U. S. attorney for the southern district of New York. Since that time he has been engaged in the practice of law. He is the author of numerous public addresses, including a eulogy on Gen. George H. Thomas.

WOODFORD, William, soldier, b. in Caroline county, Va., in 1735; d. in New York city, 13 Nov., 1780. He served with credit during the French and Indian war, and in the autumn of 1775, on the assembling of the Virginia troops at Williamsburg, was chosen colonel of the 2d Virginia regiment. At Hampton Roads, the first battle of the Revolution in Virginia, he was engaged in preventing the destruction of the town of Hampton by Lord Dunmore, and sank five of his vessels. Col. Woodford had command of the Virginians that defended Great Bridge on Elizabeth river, and defeated the force that was sent by Lord Dunmore to take it, after a sharp battle in which the British suffered a loss of fifty-five, while not a single Virginian was killed. He called the militia of Norfolk and Princess Anne counties to arms, and on 14 Dec., 1775, occupied Norfolk. He was appointed brigadier-general on 21 Feb., 1777, and given command of the 1st Virginia brigade. At the battle of the Brandywine he was wounded in the hand, but he took an active part in the battles of Germantown and Monmouth. He was then ordered to the relief of Charleston, S. C., and marched 500 miles with the Virginia and North Carolina troops in twenty-eight days. He reached Charleston in April, and was taken prisoner on 12 May, 1780. The British sent him to New York, where he died. Counties in Kentucky and Illinois bear his name.

WOODHOUSE, James, chemist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 Nov., 1770; d. there, 4 June, 1809. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1787, and at its medical department in 1792. In 1791 he served as a surgeon in Gen. Arthur St. Clair's expedition against the western Indians. When Joseph Priestley declined to accept the chair of chemistry at the University of Pennsylvania in 1795, Dr. Woodhouse received the appointment, which he held until his death. He is said to have been the first to demonstrate the superiority of the Lehigh anthracite coal in Northampton county, Pa., over the bituminous coals of Virginia for intensity and regularity of heating power. He was a member of the American philosophical society, and contributed to its transactions, to Dr. Samuel L. Mitchell's "Medical Repository," and to Dr. John R. Coxe's "Medical Museum." Besides editing Parkinson's "Chemical Pocket-Book" (Philadelphia, 1802) and Chaptal's "Elements of Chemistry" (4th ed., 2 vols., 1807), he published "Dissertation on the Chemical and Medical Properties of the Persimmon-Tree" (1792); "Observations on the Combinations of Acids, Bitters, and Astringents" (1793); "Answer to Dr. J. Priestley's Considerations on the Doctrine of Phlogiston and the Decomposition of Water" (1794); "Young Chemist's Pocket-Companion" (1797); and "Experiments and Observations in the Vegetation of Plants" (1802).

WOODHULL, Maxwell, naval officer, b. in New York city, 2 April, 1813; d. in Baltimore, Md., 19 Feb., 1863. He was the only son of Richard Miller Woodhull, the founder of Williamsburg (now the eastern district of Brooklyn, N. Y.). Maxwell Woodhull entered the navy as midshipman, 4 June, 1832, and served in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Africa, on the Brazil station, and in the Gulf of Mexico. During the Paraguay expedition he was executive officer of the flag-ship "Sabine," and he afterward commanded the brig "Bainbridge." Being attached to the coast survey, he surveyed New York harbor and the obstructions of Hell Gate, reported plans for their removal, and received the thanks of the Chamber of commerce of New York. He was also engaged on surveys on the New England coast. At the opening of the civil war he was assigned to special duty under the navy department, and promoted to the rank of commander, 1 July, 1861. He organized the supply service for the blockading fleet, commanded the "Connecticut," was afterward transferred to the gun-boat "Cimerone," and led a division of the James river flotilla during Gen. George B. McClellan's peninsular campaign. Later he was attached to Admiral Charles Wilkes's flying squadron, and ordered with the "Cimerone" to Florida waters to open St. John's and St. Mary's rivers, which was accomplished, the squadron several times engaging the batteries of the enemy. Early in 1863 he was ordered to the north with his vessel for repairs. He was killed accidentally by the discharge of a gun from which a salute was being fired.—His son, MAXWELL VAN ZANDT, entered the volunteer army in 1862 with the rank of captain, and was promoted to major and subsequently to lieutenant-colonel and assistant adjutant-general of the 15th army corps. He was brevetted colonel on the recommendation of Gen. John A. Logan, and brigadier-general of volunteers on that of Gen. Oliver O. Howard.

WOODHULL, Richard, colonist, b. in Thenford, Northampton, England, 13 Sept., 1620; d. in Brookhaven, N. Y., 17 Oct., 1690. He came to this country probably in 1648, on 29 April of which year he witnessed a deed at Easthampton, Long Island. He settled permanently at Brookhaven, Suffolk co., N. Y., in 1655, of which place he became proprietor in two patents—that of Gov. Richard Nicolls in 1666 and that of Geo. Thomas Dongan in 1686. In 1663 he represented Brookhaven at the general court at Hartford in an effort to obtain aid against the usurpations of the Dutch. In 1666 he was appointed one of the justices of the court of assizes, and in 1673 he became deputy to the Dutch commissioners in New York, and by them was commissioned a magistrate for Brookhaven.—His great-grandson, Nathaniel, soldier, b. in St. George's manor, Long Island, N. Y., 30 Dec., 1722; d. in New Utrecht, Long Island, 10 Sept., 1776. He served as major, under Gen. Abercrombie, in the attack upon Crown Point and Ticonderoga in 1758, afterward accompanied Bradstreet against Fort Frontenac, and was a colonel under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst in 1760. He was a representative from Suffolk county in the colonial assembly from 1769 till 1775, and was active there in resisting the encroachments of the crown. The colonial government was suspended in May, 1775, from which time till April, 1777, New York was governed by the Provincial congress, of which Gen. Woodhull was president in 1775, and again in 1776. He was appointed brigadier-general in August, 1775, and, on the landing of the British on Long Island, put himself at the head of the militia. A few days after the disastrous battle of Long Island he was surprised by a body of British light horse near Jamaica. He surrendered his sword, but was afterward so severely wounded by the troopers that he died in consequence. A narrative of Gen. Woodhull's capture and death was published by Henry Onderdonk, Jr. (New York, 1848), and his journal of the Montreal expedition of 1760 appeared in the "Historical Magazine" for September, 1861.—Richard's great-great-grandson, William, clergyman, b. in Miller's Place, Long Island, N. Y., 3 Dec., 1741; d. in Chester, Morris co., N. J., 24 Oct., 1824, was graduated at Princeton in 1764, entered the ministry, and in 1777 occupied the Black River (now Chester) pulpit, Morris co., N. J. He was a member of the Provincial congress of New Jersey which met at Burlington, 9 June, 1776, deposed Gov. William Franklin, the last royal governor, and framed the first constitution of New Jersey, 2 July, 1776, and of the convention that met at Trenton on 11 Dec., 1787, and adopted the U. S. constitution.—William's brother, John, clergyman, b. in Miller's Place, Long Island, N. Y., 26 Jan., 1744; d. in Freehold, N. J., 22 Nov., 1824, was graduated at Princeton in 1766, pursued theological studies with the Rev. John Blair, of Faggs Manor, Pa., and was ordained pastor of Leacock Presbyterian church, Lancaster co., Pa., 1 Aug., 1770, where he remained ten years. In 1779 he was called to Freehold, N. J., to succeed William Tennent. In 1780 he was elected a trustee of Princeton, to which institution he devoted his most faithful attention. In 1785 Mr. Woodhull was one of a committee appointed by synod to form a complete system for the organization of the Presbyterian church in the United States. This resulted in the formation of the general assembly and the present form of government and discipline. In 1798 he received the degree of D. D. from Yale. In 1812 he was one of the founders of Princeton theological seminary. While pastor at Leacock in 1777 he induced all his male parishioners to shoulder their muskets for Valley Forge, and accompanied them as chaplain. Afterward at Freehold, in 1782, he wrote to Gen. Washington begging him to retaliate by the execution of one of the English officers, then in his hands, for the murder, without trial, of Capt. Joshua Huddy, of Monmouth, whose funeral sermon Dr. Woodhull delivered from the court-house steps to an immense audience from the adjoining counties. This request was granted, and Capt. Asgill, of the British army, was designated by lot to expiate the offence. Meanwhile, however, the English general organized a court-martial to examine into the affair, when it was found that the execution of Huddy had been perpetrated under instructions from William Franklin, late governor of New Jersey, then in

New York, and president of the Associated Loyalists. Asgill was accordingly released. Only three of Dr. Woodhull's printed sermons have been preserved—"The Establishment of the Federal Constitution" (1787); "The Death of General Washington" (1799); and an ordination sermon (1813).

WOODMAN, Clarence Eugene, clergyman, b. in Saco, Me., 1 Nov., 1852. He entered Amherst, but was graduated at Trinity in 1873. After a year's study at the General theological seminary of the Protestant Episcopal church in New York city, he became a convert to the Roman Catholic faith, and entered the Congregation of St. Paul, with which he has since been connected. He is among the most eloquent public orators of his church in this country. On high festivals he is frequently invited to preach in the cathedral, and has rendered great service throughout the church. As an amateur, Father Woodman has shown ability in various departments of physical science, especially in photography. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Amherst in 1877, and that of Ph. D. by Manhattan college in 1883.

WOODMAN, John Smith, educator, b. in Durham, N. H., 6 Sept., 1819; d. there, 5 May, 1871. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1842, taught for four years in Charleston, S. C., and read law. He visited the principal cities of Europe in 1849, travelling a great part of the time on foot, and on his return to New Hampshire practised his profession in Dover, and subsequently in Rollinsford till 1851, when he became professor of mathematics in Dartmouth. He held that chair for five years, and upon the establishment of the Chandler scientific school there in 1852, also taught in that department. He became professor of civil engineering and vice-president, and the practical head of the Chandler scientific school in 1856, its prosperity dating from his entrance on these offices, all of which he held until his death. He wrote for journals and magazines, and lectured on scientific subjects. His papers on the construction and maintenance of highways showed originality and practical knowledge, and his views were often adopted.

WOODRUFF, George, jurist, b. in Binghamton, N. Y., 4 July, 1807; d. in Marshall, Mich., 13 May, 1887. He was graduated at Hobart in 1829, admitted to the bar of Ithaca, and in 1837 removed to Marshall, Mich., where he practised law. He became county judge in 1846, served two terms, was circuit commissioner three terms, and a judge of the circuit court in 1866-'75.—His son, WILLIAM S., was killed in battle before Petersburg, 25 June, 1864.—Another son, George Augustus, soldier, b. in Marshall, Mich., 27 May, 1840; d. in Gettysburg, Pa., 4 July, 1863, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1857, and became 1st lieutenant of artillery in June, 1861. He served in the Virginia peninsular campaign from March till July, 1862, participating in the siege of Yorktown and the battles of Fair Oaks, Glendale, and Malvern Hill, commanded a battery at Antietam in the Maryland campaign, was engaged at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, and during the Pennsylvania campaign commanded a battery, and was mortally wounded at Gettysburg. In this battle he was stationed on the right of Gen. Winfield S. Hancock's line. Of his death Gen. Hancock wrote: "Among all the brave men who fell at Gettysburg there are none whose loss I regret more than his."

WOODRUFF, Hiram, horse-trainer, b. in Flemington, N. J., 22 Feb., 1817; d. on Long Island, N. Y., 13 March, 1867. He began his career as a professional horse-trainer in Philadelphia in 1831, and acquired a unique reputation for honesty and fair dealing, as well as for skill in driving and training horses. He was the author of "The Trotting-Horse of America, with Reminiscences of the Trotting Turf," edited by Charles J. Foster, with a memoir and an introduction by George Wilkes (New York, 1869).

WOODRUFF, Israel Carle, soldier, b. in Trenton, N. J., in 1815; d. in Tompkinsville, N. Y., 10 Dec., 1878. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1836, became 1st lieutenant of topographical engineers in 1842, and was superintending topographical engineer of the survey of the Creek boundary in 1850-'1. He then engaged in reconnaissances of military roads to the South Pass of the Rocky mountains and to New Mexico, was subsequently engineer and inspector of light-houses on the great lakes, and in 1853 became captain of topographical engineers for fourteen years' continuous service. He was assistant to the chief topographical engineer at Washington, D. C., in 1857-'63, became major in that branch of the service in August, 1861, and from 1863 until his death was assistant to the chief engineer at Washington. In that capacity he was engaged in the defence of Washington against the advance of Gen. Jubal A. Early in July, 1864. He became lieutenant-colonel of engineers in August of the same year, and was a member of the board of examination of engineer officers in 1864-'5. On 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted colonel, U. S. army, "for faithful and meritorious services in the corps of engineers," and brigadier-general in the same "for meritorious services during the civil war."

WOODRUFF, Wilford, president of the Mormon church, b. in Northington (now Avon), Conn., 1 March, 1807. He was educated in Farmington, early joined the Mormon church, and was ordained to the priesthood in 1833. Mr. Woodruff followed the church in its journeyings through the United States until it finally reached Salt Lake City. He was ordained one of the twelve apostles on 29 April, 1839, at Far West, Mo., with the special designation of "the Banner of the Gospel." He has been sent on missions throughout the United States and Europe, and in all has travelled about 150,000 miles. Mr. Woodruff became president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints on the death of John Taylor in 1887, retaining still that office, having held at that time the place of president of the twelve apostles. He has been a member of the Utah legislative assembly for twenty-two years. He served in 1843 on the editorial staff of the "Times and Seasons" in Nauvoo, Ill., and in 1843 on the "Millennial Star" in Liverpool. Mr. Woodruff is a believer in polygamy, and entered into that practice before there was any law against it in the United States. See "Early Days of Mormonism," by James Harrison Kennedy (New York, 1888).

WOODS, Andrew Salter, jurist, b. in Bath, Me., 2 June, 1803; d. there, 30 June, 1863. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1825, and began the practice of law in his native town. He attained to eminence in his profession, and in 1840 was chosen a judge of the supreme court of New Hampshire, becoming chief justice in 1855. Dartmouth gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1852.

WOODS, Leonard, clergyman, b. in Princeton, Mass., 19 June, 1774; d. in Andover, Mass., 24 Aug., 1854. His father, Samuel, possessed "Puritanic piety," and his habits of serious thought on metaphysical subjects obtained for him the title of "Philosopher Woods." The son was brought up strictly, and while very young was conversant with the works of John Locke and Jonathan Edwards. He was graduated at Harvard in 1796, taught, studied theology at Somers, Conn., and in 1798 was ordained pastor at Newbury, Mass. When the Andover theological seminary was founded in 1808 he became professor of Christian theology there, holding that chair for thirty-eight years, and becoming professor emeritus in 1846. Dartmouth gave him the degree of D. D. in 1810. Dr. Woods was active in the establishment of the American tract society, the Temperance society, and the board of commissioners of foreign missions, of whose prudential committee he was a member for twenty-five years. He ably defended orthodox Calvinism against Unitarian theology, and while he admitted improvements in theologians and theological science, thought theological truths were fixed and unalterable. His literary reputation dates from his contribution in 1805 of a series of papers in the "Panoplist," a religious periodical, in which he defended Calvinism against Joseph Buckminster, William Channing, and other Unitarian divines. Dr. Henry B. Smith says of him: "He is emphatically the 'judicious' divine of the later New England theology. He educated more than 1,000 preachers, who had neither crotchets nor airy aims." He left in manuscript a "History of Andover Seminary." His publications include "Letters to Unitarians" (Andover, 1820); "Lectures on the Inspiration of the Scriptures" (1829); "Memoirs of American Missionaries" (1833); "Examination of the Doctrine of Perfection" (1841); "Lectures on Church Government" (New York, 1843); "Lectures on Swedenborgianism" (1846); and his collected works, containing lectures, essays, sermons, and reviews (5 vols., Andover, 1849-'50).—His son, Leonard, scholar, b. in Newbury, Mass., 24 Nov., 1807; d. in Boston, Mass., 24 Dec., 1878, was graduated at Union college in 1827 and at Andover theological seminary in 1830. In 1831-'3 he was resident graduate scholar at Andover, and in 1833 he was licensed to preach. His private pupil, Richard Henry Dana, says of him: "At the age of twenty-four years he had been the first scholar in the Phillips academy, the first in every branch at Union, had been graduated at the Theological seminary the acknowledged foremost man of his period, and had published a translation of Knapp's 'Christian Theology,' enriched with a long and fully thought-out preface, with original notes showing profound scholarship. He was assisting Professor Stuart in his commentary on the 'Epistle to the Romans,' and aiding Professor Robinson in editing the 'Biblical Repository,' then the most scholastic periodical in America, and was assistant instructor of Hebrew in the seminary." He edited the "Literary and Theological Review" in New York city in 1834-'7, and although that periodical was the organ of the Presbyterian and Congregational churches, he directly opposed the opinions of many of its supporters, objecting to the proposals of temperance and anti-slavery societies and popular revivalists, and to the German Reformation, and defending the few and simple conditions of admission into the Anglican communion, as compared with the minute requirements of doctrine in his own church. He was professor of sacred literature in Bangor theological seminary in 1836-'9, and from 1839 till 1866 president of Bowdoin. He never accepted a pastoral charge, but occasionally delivered sermons and addresses. He went abroad in 1833, and contracted friendships with eminent theologians in Rome and in Oxford. His familiarity with the classics caused him to be congratulated by Gregory XVI. for his "excellent Latin and the richness of his discourse," and the Oxford theology having won his approval, he was the theological champion and personal friend of Dr. Edward B. Pusey. "He was even more remarkable, perhaps, for his conversations than for his public addresses," says his biographer, Prof. Edwards A. Park. Having resigned the presidency of Bowdoin in 1866 (see the accompanying vignette), he accepted from the legislature of Maine a commission to visit Europe to obtain materials for the early history of the state. He engaged the assistance of Dr. John G. Kohl in the work, which subsequently assumed shape in his "Discovery of Maine" (Portland, Me., 1868), and procured the Hakluyt manuscript of the "Westerne Planting." Dr. Woods was preparing this document for the press when his health declined, and the papers were completed and published by Charles Deane, in the "Proceedings of the Maine Historical Society" (Portland, 1877). Dr. Woods furnished other valuable matter, which appeared in the 1st and 2d volumes of the publications of that society, and was engaged in further work when his materials were destroyed by a fire that consumed his entire library. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1846, and Bowdoin that of LL. D. in 1866. Besides the works already referred to, including his translation of George Christian Knapp's "Christian Theology" (2 vols., New York, 1831-'3), Dr. Woods published an "Address on the Life and Character of Parker Cleveland" (Portland, Me., 1859), and "Address on the Opening of the New Medical Hall of the Medical School of Maine" (1862). See a "Memorial" of him, by Edwards A. Park (Andover, 1880), and an article by Richard H. Dana in the "Century Magazine" for June, 1881.—The first Leonard's nephew, Alva, educator, b. in Shoreham, Vt., 13 Aug., 1794; d. in Providence, R. I., in July, 1887, was graduated at Harvard in 1817, and at Andover seminary in 1821. Immediately upon his graduation at the seminary he was elected professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Columbian college, Washington, D. C. In 1824 he was elected to the same chair in Brown university, where he remained until 1828, when he was made president of Transylvania university, Ky. He continued in this place until 1831, when he became president of the University of Alabama, at Tuscaloosa. Resigning this office in 1837, he removed soon afterward to Providence, R. I., where he spent the remainder of his days. He was a trustee and fellow of Brown, and a trustee of Newton theological institution. He founded five fellowships in the former, and a lectureship on elocution in the latter. He received from Brown, in 1828, the degree of D. D. Dr. Woods published several inaugural and other addresses.

WOODS, Robert Stuart, Canadian jurist, b. in Sandwich, Ont., in 1819. His grandfather, a Scotch merchant, emigrated to Canada. Robert was educated at Sandwich, took an active part in the rebellion of 1837, followed Sir Allan N. MacNab through the campaign, and was engaged in the affair of the "Caroline." He subsequently studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1842, became a queen's counsel in 1872, and continued the practice of his profession till he was appointed junior judge of Kent county in 1885. He was largely instrumental in securing the construction of the Great Western railway, was an unsuccessful candidate for parliament in 1854, and is revising-officer of the electoral district of Kent. He is an active advocate of the temperance reform.

WOODS, William, clergyman, b. in Albemarle county, Va., in 1738; d. there in 1819. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and his father, William, came from Pennsylvania with the emigrants that followed John Lewis up Shenandoah valley, and became the owner of large tracts of land in Albemarle county, Va. The son was a bold and independent thinker, and became a Baptist when that denomination was struggling for existence against great opposition. In 1780 he was ordained a minister of that faith, and founded the old Albemarle Baptist church, near the University of Virginia. Thomas Jefferson frequently attended his church, and wrote that "it was a model for a republic." At the request of Jefferson he resigned his charge in 1799 that he might be elected to the legislature. He served during the agitation of 1800 over the Kentucky resolutions of 1798-'9, and his name heads the list of state-rights Republican voters in that body. During his term a bill was passed to increase the pay of the members, but he refused to accept its privileges.—His son, Micajah, jurist, b. in Albemarle county, Va., in 1776; d. there in 1837, was for twenty years a member of the justice's court for Albemarle county, and for many years the presiding justice of that county.—His son, John Rodes, physician, b. in Albemarle county, Va., 15 Jan., 1815; d. there, 9 July, 1885, was graduated in medicine at the University of Virginia in 1835, but ceased to practise in 1837, devoted his attention to scientific agriculture, and brought large importations of English stock to his estate, "Holkham." He was a member of the old Whig party, a personal friend of Henry Clay, and a member of many Whig conventions. For eight years he was a director of the Virginia Central (now Chesapeake and Ohio) railway company. Dr. Woods was a supporter of the University of Virginia, and a member of its board of visitors from 1867 till 1872.—John Rodes's son, MICAJAH, lawyer, b. at Holkham, Albemarle co., Va., 17 May, 1844, has been attorney for the commonwealth of Albemarle county since 1870, and was a member of the board of visitors to the University of Virginia from 1872 till 1876.

WOODS, William Burnham, soldier, b. in Newark, Licking co., Ohio, 3 Aug., 1824; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 May, 1887. His father, Ezekiel S. Woods, was a native of Kentucky, of Scotch-Irish parentage. The son was educated at Western Reserve college and at Yale, where he was graduated in 1845. He afterward studied law in his native place, and practised there, was elected mayor of Newark in 1856 and 1857, and in the latter year was chosen to the Ohio legislature. He was elected speaker of the house in 1858, and re-elected to the legislature in 1859. Soon after the opening of the civil war he entered the National army as lieutenant-colonel of the 76th Ohio volunteers, and from November, 1861, till the close of the war he was continuously at the front, except for a period of three months. He participated in the battles of Shiloh, Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post (where he was slightly wounded), Resaca, Dallas, Atlanta, Jonesboro', Lovejoy Station, and Bentonville. He was also present at the sieges of Vicksburg and Jackson, and commanded a division in Gen. William T. Sherman's march to the sea. He was appointed brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, 12 Jan., 1865; brevet major-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865; full brigadier-general, 31 May, 1865; and on 17 Feb., 1866, was mustered out of the service. Upon leaving the army, Gen. Woods engaged in cotton-planting in Alabama, resuming at the same time the practice of law, and taking an active part in the reconstruction of the state, of which he became chancellor in 1868. In 1869 he was appointed U. S. judge for the 5th circuit, and on 15 Dec., 1880, was nominated by President Hayes an associate justice of the U. S. supreme court, being confirmed on 22 Dec.—His brother, Charles Robert, soldier, b. in Newark, Ohio, 19 Feb., 1827; d. there, 26 Feb., 1885, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1852, appointed brevet 2d lieutenant of infantry, and served on garrison and frontier duty till 1861. In the attempt to relieve Fort Sumter in April of that year, he commanded the troops on the steamer "Star of the West," and he was appointed colonel of the 76th Ohio volunteers, 13 Oct., 1861. He was at Fort Donelson and Shiloh, and commanded a brigade during the siege of Corinth, and a regiment in the Vicksburg campaign. He was recommended for promotion for bravery at Arkansas Post, and became a brigadier-general of volunteers, 4 Aug., 1863, leading a brigade in the 15th corps at Lookout Mountain and Mission Ridge. In the campaign in Georgia and the Carolinas he commanded a division in the same corps. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 4 Aug., 1863, brevetted major-general, 22 Nov., 1864, made brevet brigadier- and major-general in the U. S. army, 13 March, 1865, and mustered out of the volunteer service, 1 Sept., 1866. He was transferred to the 27th infantry, 27 Sept., 1866, and during the latter part of the same year was on the plains fighting Indians and guarding railways. He became colonel of the 2d infantry, 23 March, 1874, and was retired on 15 Dec. of the same year. He was familiarly known in the army as "Susan Wood," a name that had been applied to him when he was a cadet at the military academy.

WOODVILLE, Richard Caton, b. in Baltimore, Md., about 1825; d. in London, Eng., 13 Sept., 1855. He studied in Düsseldorf, whence he sent to the American art union "The Card-Players" (1847), and "The Cavalier's Return" and "Mexican News" (1848). He twice revisited Europe, and while in London was cut short in a career of much promise. Among his effective and well-finished genre pictures were "Old '76," "Young '48," "The Politicians," "The Game of Chess," "Waiting for the Stage," and "The Sailor's Wedding." Several of them were engraved or lithographed.

WOODWARD, Ashbel, physician, b. in Wellington, Conn., 26 June, 1804; d. in Franklin, Conn., 20 Nov., 1885. He was graduated at the medical department of Bowdoin in 1829, settled in Franklin, Conn., and resided there until his death, engaging in the practice of his profession and in genealogical and historical researches. At the beginning of the civil war he volunteered as surgeon in the 26th army corps, sharing in the siege and capture of Port Hudson. Yale gave him the honorary degree of M. D. in 1854. Dr. Woodward was president of the Connecticut medical society for many years, and a member of the New England historic-genealogical society, to which he contributed about fifty papers. His publications include "Vindication of Gen. Israel Putnam" (Norwich, Conn., 1841); "Historical Account of the Connecticut Medical Society" (Hartford, 1859); "Biographical Sketches of the Early Physicians of Norwich" (Norwich, 1859); "Medical Ethics" (Hartford, 1860); "Life," an address (1861); "M memoir of Col. Thomas Knowlton" (Boston, 1861); "Life of Gen. Nathaniel Lyon" (Hartford, 1862); "Vindication of Army Surgeons" (New Haven, 1863); "Specialism in Medicine" (1866); and "The Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Settlement of Franklin," an address delivered in April, 1868 (1870). See a memoir of him by his son, Henry H. Woodward (Boston, 1886).

WOODWARD, Augustus B., jurist, b. in Virginia about 1775; d. in Florida in 1827. He was a laborious student, adopted the profession of law, and in 1805 emigrated to Michigan to become a judge of the territory, holding office till 1824. During that service he published the "code of laws" that bears his name. He was then appointed a judge of the territory of Florida, where he died after a service of three years. He was an ardent patriot, and during the second war with Great Britain was the author of the resolution that was adopted by the legislature of Michigan prohibiting the wearing of any clothing made from English goods. He is said to have been a founder of the town of Ypsilanti, Mich., but the statement is not corroborated. He published "Considerations on the Substance of the Sun" (Washington, D. C., 1801); "Considerations on the Executive Government of the United States of America" (Flatbush, 1809); and "A System of Universal Science" (Philadelphia, 1816).

WOODWARD, Calvin Milton, educator, b. in Fitchburg, Mass., 25 Aug., 1837. He was graduated at Harvard in 1860, and became principal of Brown high-school in Newburyport, Mass. During the civil war he was captain in the 48th Massachusetts volunteers, taking part in the siege and capture of Port Hudson under Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks. In 1865 he was chosen vice-principal of the Smith academy of Washington university, St. Louis, and in 1868 he was appointed assistant professor of mathematics in that university, where since 1870 he has held the chair of mathematics and applied mechanics, also since 1870 he has been dean of its polytechnic school. He planned and organized in 1879 the manual training-school as a subordinate department of the university without resigning his other duties, and has filled the directorship of this school from the first. The St. Louis manual training-school is the pioneer of its kind in America, and has served as the model in organizing other similar schools, in consequence of which Prof. Woodward's expositions of the aims and value of manual training have had the widest influence in shaping the new education both at home and abroad. He was a member of the school board of St. Louis in 1878-'80, and president of the St. Louis engineer club in 1883-'4. Prof. Woodward was president of the industrial department of the National educational association in 1882-'4, and vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science in 1888, presiding over the section on mechanical science. In 1885 he was invited to present a paper on "Manual Training" before the educational conference in Manchester, England, and afterward he visited the educational institutions of Europe. He has written a large number of papers on mathematical subjects and manual training, which he has contributed to scientific journals and other periodicals. His books are "History of the St. Louis Bridge" (St. Louis, 1882), and "The Manual Training-School: its Aims, Methods, and Results" (Boston, 1887).

WOODWARD, George Washington, jurist, b. in Bethany, Pa., 26 March, 1809; d. in Rome, Italy, 10 May, 1875. He received an academic education, and studied and practised law in his native town. He was a member of the Pennsylvania constitutional convention in 1827, president-judge of the 4th judicial district in 1841-'51, and a judge of the superior court of Pennsylvania in 1852-'67. He was chosen to congress as a Democrat in 1866, and was twice re-elected. He was a delegate to the National Democratic convention in 1868. His death occurred during a tour abroad.

WOODWARD, Joseph Janvier, surgeon, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 Oct., 1833; d. near that city, 17 Aug., 1884. He was graduated at the Philadelphia central high-school in 1850, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1853. He practised his profession in Philadelphia, and also gave private instruction in the use of the microscope and in pathological histology, and with Dr. Charles Bishop he conducted a "quiz" class in connection with the course of instruction in the University of Pennsylvania. Subsequently he became demonstrator in operative surgery in that place and clinical surgical assistant, and then took charge of the surgical clinic of the university. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the U. S. army as assistant surgeon, serving with the 2d U. S. artillery in the Army of the Potomac, and then became chief medical officer of the 5th division in the Department of Northeast Virginia, being present at the first battle of Bull Run. Later he became medical officer of three light batteries in Gen. Philip Kearny's division in the Army of the Potomac. In May, 1862, he was assigned to duty in the surgeon-general's office in Washington, and charged with the duty of collecting materials for a medical and surgical history of the war and for a military medical museum. At the close of the war he received the brevets of captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel, and on 28 July, 1866, he was commissioned captain and assistant surgeon. Soon after his assignment to Washington his attention was directed to experiments in photo-micrography, and he improved the old methods and devised new ones for this class of work. His publications in this direction gave a powerful stimulus to the construction of microscopic objectives, and the great improvements that have been made in these instruments of research are due chiefly to his labors. He was made surgeon with the rank of major on 26 June, 1876. Dr. Woodward was associated in the management of President Garfield's case after he was shot, and the confinement, anxiety, and labor to which he was subjected during the president's long illness proved too great for him and hastened the sickness that terminated his life. In addition to his connection with scientific societies, including his election in 1873 to the National academy of sciences, he was president of the American medical association and of the Philosophical society of Washington. He published about 100 single papers, and in book-form "Outlines of the Chief Camp Diseases of the U. S. Armies" (Philadelphia, 1863) and "The Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion" (2 vols., Washington, 1870-'9).—His sister, Annie Aubertine Woodward-Moore, translator, b. in Montgomery county, Pa., 27 Sept., 1841, was educated in Philadelphia, studied music with Carl Gartner, and gave successful piano recitals and concerts in Boston, Philadelphia, and New York. She also early devoted herself to literary pursuits, and translated extensively from the French and German. She was occupied in translating from the Scandinavian tongues with Rasmus B. Anderson in 1876, and for twelve years was busy preparing English versions of Bjornstjerne Bjornson's novels (Boston, 1881-'2), and of Georg Brande's "Authors of the Nineteenth Century" (New York, 1886). She has resided in Madison, Wis., since 1877, was a founder of the Wisconsin conservatory of music, and has lectured extensively, especially on Norwegian literature and music. She married Samuel H. Moore in 1887. Mrs. Moore has published most of her writings under the pen-name of "Auber Forestier." They include, besides the translations that have been noticed, English versions from the German of Robert Byr's "Sphynx" (Philadelphia, 1871); "The Struggle for Existence" (1873); Sophia Verena's "Above the Tempest and the Tide" (1873); "Samuel Brohl & Co.," from the French of Victor Cherbuliez (New York, 1877); "Echoes from the Mist Land, or the Nibelungen-Lied Revealed" (Chicago, 1880); "The Spell-Bound Fiddler," from the Norse of Kristofer Janson (1881); "The Norway Music-Album," Norway folk-songs, dances, etc., edited and furnished with English text (Boston, 1881); and "Voice-Culture," from the German (1885).

WOODWARD, Samuel, physician, b. in Watertown, Conn., in 1750; d. in Torrington, Conn., 6 Jan., 1835. By economy and industry he succeeded in obtaining sufficient means to enter Yale when he was twenty-six years old, but the class of which he was a member was dispersed by the Revolution, and he was not graduated. He then adopted the profession of medicine, and began practice in Torrington, Conn., where he remained for the greater part of his life. He served in the legislature for several terms, during the last of which he was called the "father of the house," and was chosen its speaker. He was the first in that body to advocate openly Democratic principles after the Revolution, and was the unsuccessful candidate of that party for congress. He established a successful practice, prepared a large number of students for the medical profession, and was active in temperance and other reforms.—His son, Samuel Bayard, physician, b. in Torrington, Conn., 10 June, 1787; d. in Northampton, Mass., 3 Jan., 1850, adopted the profession of medicine, and settled in Wethersfield, Conn., where he became physician to the state prison, and was for several years a member of the state senate. He was a founder of the Retreat for the insane at Hartford, Conn., and in 1832-'46 was superintendent of the Massachusetts state lunatic asylum at Worcester. He then removed to Northampton, Mass., where he practised until his death. Dr. Woodward was a projector of the Massachusetts school for idiotic youth and of an asylum for inebriates. He published essays on diseases of the mind and nerves, and contributed to medical journals.

WOODWORTH, John, jurist, b. in Schodack, N. Y., 12 Nov., 1768; d. in Albany, N. Y., 1 June, 1858. He studied law with John Lansing in Albany, was admitted to the bar in 1791, and began practice in Troy, N. Y., but he returned to Albany in 1806, and resided there until his death. He was surrogate of Rensselaer county in 1793-1804, a member of the assembly in 1803, and of the state senate in 1804-'7, attorney-general of New York in 1804-'8, and a judge of the state supreme court in 1819-'28. He published "Reminiscences of Troy from its Settlement in 1790 till 1807" (Albany, 1855), and with William P. Van Ness revised the laws of New York (2 vols., 1813).

WOODWORTH, John Maynard, physician, b. in Big Flats, Chemung co., N. Y., 15 Aug., 1837; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 March, 1879. He was educated at the University of Chicago, became curator of the museum of the Chicago academy of sciences in 1858, and established the Museum of natural history in the University of Chicago in 1859. He was graduated at the Medical college of Chicago in 1862, entered the National army as post surgeon of volunteers, and served under Gen. William T. Sherman till 1865, becoming full surgeon in 1863, and subsequently medical inspector of the Army of the Tennessee. In March, 1865, he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel of volunteers for his services during the civil war. He became professor of anatomy in Chicago medical college in 1866, surgeon of the Union soldiers' home, and sanitary inspector of the city board of health in 1868. In 1871-'9 he was supervising surgeon-general of the Marine hospital, Washington, D. C. In that service he introduced systematic methods of conducting its affairs, required candidates for medical offices to pass examinations, and substituted inexpensive pavilions for costly insanitary hospitals of iron and stone. He was president of the Alumni association of Chicago medical college in 1870, one of the twelve organizers of the American public health association in 1872, a member of many state and National professional bodies, and a vice-president of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee. In 1876 he read before the International medical congress a paper entitled "Quarantine with Reference to Cholera and Yellow Fever," and submitted six propositions to that body on the subject, which were adopted. He wrote numerous essays and papers that were published in the "Transactions of the American Medical Association," and is the author of "Primary Surgery of Gen. Sherman's Campaigns" (Chicago, 1866); "The Mystery of Life," an address (1871); "Regulations of the United States Marine Hospital Service" (Washington, D. C., 1873); "Hospitals and Hospital Construction" (1873); "The Immigration Service of the United States" (1873); "Nomenclature of Diseases" (1874); and "Cholera Epidemic in the United States in 1873" (1875).

WOODWORTH, Samuel, poet, b. in Scituate, Mass., 13 Jan., 1785; d. in New York city, 9 Dec., 1842. He was the youngest son of a farmer and Revolutionary soldier, whose poverty prevented him from educating his children, but Samuel's verses attracted the attention of Rev. Nehemiah Thomas, who taught him the classics for. He was apprenticed to Benjamin Russell, editor of the "Columbian Centinel," when he was seventeen years of age, and a year after the expiration of his term removed to New Haven, Conn., where he issued a weekly paper called the "Belles-Lettres Repository," of which he was "editor, publisher, printer, and more than once carrier," but the enterprise failed at the end of its second month. He removed to New York in 1809, and during the second war with Great Britain conducted a weekly paper called "The War," and a monthly Swedenborgian magazine entitled the "Halcyon Luminary and Theological Repository," both of which were unsuccessful. His next literary undertaking was a contract in 1816 to write a history of the second war with Great Britain in the style of a romance, entitled the "Champions of Freedom," which was published (2 vols., New York, 1816), but possesses little merit either as history or as a novel. With George P. Morris he began, in 1823, the publication of the "New York Mirror," but he withdrew from the partnership within a year. He edited the "Parthenon" in 1827, afterward contributed frequently to the press, and was the author of several operettas that were produced with success, of which the "Forest Rose" is still occasionally performed. During his later life he was paralyzed, and his resources were meagre. Of his numerous lyrics the "Old Oaken Bucket" is the only one that will probably live. George Perkins Marsh says of this poem in his "Lectures on the English Language" (New York, 1861): "Woodworth's fine song, the 'Old Oaken Bucket,' which has embalmed in undying verse so many of the most touching recollections of rural childhood, will preserve the more poetic form oaken, together with the memory of the almost obsolete implement it celebrates, through all dialect changes, as long as English shall be a spoken tongue." His poetical works were collected and edited by his son, with a memoir of him by George P. Morris (2 vols., New York, 1861).—His son, Selim E., naval officer, b. in New York city, 27 Nov., 1815; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 29 Jan., 1871, when twelve years old set out with a rifle to cross the continent to the Pacific, but was met by friends and sent home after walking 300 miles. In 1834 he sailed as captain's clerk in the ship "Margaret Oakley," in which he was shipwrecked off Madagascar. He lived on the island with the natives, but eventually reached Mauritius, whence he returned home after an absence of four years. He was appointed a midshipman in the navy, 16 June, 1838, became a passed midshipman, 20 May, 1844, and, obtaining special leave of absence in 1846, made the journey to the Pacific overland, travelling from St. Louis to Columbia river in sixty days. He then went down the coast to the site of San Francisco, where he reported for duty as a master on board the sloop "Warren," and subsequently served in command of the transport "Anita" until the close of the Mexican war. He resigned from the navy, 11 Feb., 1850, and was elected to the first state senate of California. He engaged in mercantile pursuits, but at the opening of the civil war he volunteered and was commissioned acting lieutenant, 10 Sept., 1861. He served under Farragut at New Orleans and in Mississippi river, and was promoted two grades to commander, 16 July, 1862, for gallant conduct. He commanded the steamer "Narragansett," which he took out to the Pacific coast in 1865-'6, and upon his return resigned from the navy, 31 May, 1866.—Samuel's nephew, Francis C., author, b. in Colchester, Conn., in 1812; d. at sea, 5 June, 1859, was a printer by trade, and afterward preached, but withdrew from the ministry on account of failing health. He then devoted himself to juvenile literature, in which he was remarkably successful. He died during a voyage between Savannah and New York. His numerous publications include "Our own Fields" (New York, 1850); "Youth's Book of Gems" (1851); "Uncle Frank's Home Stories" (6 vols., 1851); "Uncle Frank's Picture Gallery" (2 vols., 1852); "Wonders of the Insect World" (1853); "The World as it is, or a Miniature Sketch of the Earth and its Inhabitants" (Philadelphia, 1854); "Theodore Tinker's Stories for Little Folks" (12 vols., New York, 1854-'8); "Young American's Life of Frémont" (1856) and "Uncle Frank's Pleasant Pages for the Fireside" (1857). He edited "Woodworth's American Miscellany" (12 vols., 1853 et seq.), and "Woodworth's Youth's Cabinet," which was continued after his death (15 vols., 1854 et seq.).

WOOL, John Ellis, soldier, b. in Newburg, N. Y., 20 Feb., 1784; d. in Troy, N. Y., 10 Nov., 1869. His father was a soldier of the Revolution. The son was educated at the common schools of his native town, and, after a short experience in mercantile life in Troy, began the study of the law, at which he was engaged when war with England was declared. He entered the military service as an officer of volunteers, raised a company in Troy, was commissioned captain in the 13th U. S. infantry, 14 April, 1812, and greatly distinguished himself at Queenstown Heights, 13 Oct., 1812, where he was severely wounded. He was promoted major of the 29th infantry, 13 April, 1813, and at Plattsburg on 11 Sept., 1814, he received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel for gallantry. Maj. Wool was transferred to the 6th infantry, 17 May, 1815, and in the subsequent reorganization was made inspector-general of the army, with rank of colonel, 29 April, 1816. The routine of his duty was varied in 1832 by a professional tour abroad, comprising an inspection of the military establishments of Europe for the benefit of the U. S. service. In 1836 he effected the transfer of the Cherokee Indians to the country west of the Mississippi, and on 25 June, 1841, he was appointed brigadier-general in the U. S. army. He was active at the beginning of the Mexican war in preparing volunteer forces for the field, and in less than six weeks despatched to the seat of war 12,000 men, fully armed and equipped. He was Gen. Zachary Taylor's second in command at Buena Vista, selecting the ground for the action, making the preliminary dispositions, and commanding on the field till the arrival of his superior. For gallant and meritorious conduct in that battle he was brevetted major-general, 23 Feb., 1847. For his services during the war with Mexico congress awarded him a vote of thanks and a sword of honor, and a sword was also presented to Gen. Wool by the state of New York. He commanded the eastern military division in 1848-'53, and the Department of the Pacific in 1854-'7, putting an end to Indian disturbances in Washington and Oregon territories in 1856 by a three-months' campaign. He had charge of the Department of the East in 1860, and at the opening of the civil war saved Fortress Monroe by timely re-enforcements, afterward commanding there at the head of the Department of Virginia. He was promoted major-general, U. S. army, 16 May, 1862, and had charge successively of the middle military department and the Department of the East till July, 1863. He was retired from active service, 1 Aug., 1863. Gen. Wool was a rigid disciplinarian, and had no superior in the U. S. service as an organizer of troops. The monument shown in the illustration was raised to his memory in Troy. It is 75 feet high, and bears the following inscription from the pen of William Cullen Bryant: "This stone is erected to Major-General

John Ellis Wool, the gallant soldier, the able commander, and the patriotic citizen, distinguished in many battles; and to Sarah Moulton, his excellent and worthy consort."

WOOLF, Solomon, educator, b. in New York city, 6 Jan., 1841. He was graduated at the College of the city of New York in 1859, and in the same year was appointed tutor in descriptive geometry there and in the Cooper Union. In 1878 he was appointed to the professorship of geometry and drawing in that college, which chair he has since held. Besides various contributions to the press, he has published "A Course in Descriptive Geometry" (New York, 1888).

WOOLMAN, John, Quaker preacher, b. in Northampton, Burlington co., N. J., in August, 1720; d. in York, England, 7 Oct., 1772. He worked on a farm with his father till he was twenty-one years of age, when he became clerk to a storekeeper at Mount Holly, where he opened a school for poor children, and first began to speak at the meetings of the sect. Wishing to visit the various societies of Friends throughout the colonies, and to preach to them, he first learned the trade of a tailor, as best adapted for supporting him in the itinerant life that he had resolved to lead. In 1746 he set out on a tour, with Isaac Andrews, to visit the Friends in the back settlements of Virginia, and he spent a great part of his life in such journeys, for the purpose of preaching. He spoke and wrote much against slavery. In 1763 he visited the Indians on Susquehanna river. Early in 1772 he went to England, and, while attending the quarterly meeting at York, he was smitten with small-pox, and died, after a few days' illness. Woolman's writings have been much admired, and were highly praised by Charles Lamb. Perhaps the most interesting of his works is the posthumous "Journal of John Woolman's Life and Travels in the Service of the Gospel" (Philadelphia, 1775, edited, with an introduction, by John G. Whittier, 1871). Woolman also published "Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes" (Philadelphia, 1753; 2d part, 1762); "Considerations on Pure Wisdom and Human Policy, on Labor, on Schools, and on the Right Use of the Lord's Outward Gifts" (1768); "Considerations on the True Harmony of Mankind, and How it is to be Maintained" (1770); and "An Epistle to the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings of Friends" (1772). His "Serious Considerations, with Some of his Dying Expressions," appeared after his death (London, 1773). Various manuscripts that he left were included in an edition of his works (2 parts, Philadelphia, 1774-'5).

WOOLSEY, Melancthon Taylor, naval officer, b. in New York in 1782; d. in Utica, N. Y., 18 May, 1838. His father was an officer in the war of independence and resided at Plattsburg, on Lake Champlain, where he was collector of the port. The son studied law, but entered the navy as a midshipman, 9 April, 1800, and cruised in the sloop "Adams" in the West Indies in 1800-'1. He went to Tripoli just before the close of the Tripolitan war, was promoted to lieutenant, 14 Feb., 1807, and went to Washington, where he prepared a code of signals for the navy. He was sent to Lake Ontario to superintend the building of three naval vessels, and at Oswego, in 1808, laid the keel of the "Oneida," the first U. S. naval vessel that was ever built on that lake. He commanded the "Oneida," and was in charge of the naval station at Sackett's Harbor when the war of 1812 began. On 19 July, 1812, a British squadron of five vessels came in sight, when Woolsey attempted to escape into the open sea in the "Oneida"; but as this was impossible, he returned into Sackett's Harbor, where he landed half of his battery on shore and repelled the British after an engagement of two hours. Com. Isaac Chauncey arrived soon after this victory, and assumed chief command. Other vessels were built, and in November, 1813, Kingston was attacked, Woolsey commanding the "Oneida" and continuing to serve as second in command. He was promoted to master-commandant, 24 July, 1813, and was present at the attack on York and the assault on Fort George. In the schooner "Sylph" he sailed with Com. Chauncey's squadron on 28 Aug., 1813, and chased the British squadron under Sir James Yeo for six days, participating in numerous engagements during September. On 5 Oct., 1813, he captured the cutter "Drummond" and the sloops "Elizabeth," "Mary Ann," and "Lady Gore" off False Ducks. In May, 1814, Woolsey was sent to Oswego in the "Sylph" to transport guns and cables to Sackett's Harbor at a period when the British had again obtained control of the lake. The British squadron appeared off Oswego while he was there, and he circulated a report that the destination of the guns and stores had been changed, after which, availing himself of a dark night, he went out with a flotilla of nineteen heavy boats carrying the guns and stores. The British discovered his retreat and followed him to Sandy Creek, where he was landing the guns when they appeared. Maj. Daniel Appling, who had accompanied him with a force of riflemen, prepared an ambushade, and with Woolsey met the British with such a destructive fire that in the end they were all captured. Three gun-boats, two barges, one gig, six guns, and 186 men were taken on this occasion. Woolsey then took his guns and stores to Sackett's Harbor, and the Americans regained command of the lake. He had charge of the brig "Jones" from the following year until the close of the war. He remained at Sackett's Harbor after peace was restored until 1824 in command of that station. He was promoted to captain, 27 April, 1816, had the frigate "Constellation" in the West Indies from 1824 till June, 1827, was in charge of the Pensacola navy-yard in 1827-'31, and commodore commanding the Brazil station in 1832-'4. In 1836-'7 he had charge of the surveys of the Chesapeake bay, after which his health declined.—His son, Melancthon Brooks, naval officer, b. in New York, 11 Aug., 1817; d. in Pensacola, Fla., 2 Oct., 1874, entered the navy as a midshipman, 24 Sept., 1832, attended the naval school at Philadelphia, and became a passed midshipman, 16 July, 1840. He was promoted to master, 22 March, 1847, and to lieutenant, 16 July, 1847, and by action of the retiring board he was placed on the reserved list, 13 Sept., 1855. In 1861 he was assigned to active duty and attached to the receiving-ship at New York. He commanded the steamer "Ellen," on the South Atlantic blockade, in 1861-'2, in which he engaged Fort Pemberton at Wapper creek, S. C., in May, 1862, repelled Confederate cavalry at Secessionville, 1 June, 1862, and participated in the attack on James island, 3 June, 1862. He was commissioned a commander, 16 July, 1862, on the reserved list, and commanded the sloop "Vandalia" in 1862-'3, and the steamer "Princess Royal," in the West Gulf squadron, in 1863-'5. He participated in the engagement and repulse of the Confederates at Donaldsonville, La., on 28 June, 1863, and was highly commended for this victory. He continued to serve on the blockade until the close of the war, and was placed on the active list and promoted to captain, 25 July, 1866, and to commodore, 20 May, 1871. On 6 March, 1873, he was appointed commandant of the Pensacola navy-yard. In 1874 Woolsey had orders to go to the north on duty, but he declined to leave his post when a yellow-fever epidemic appeared, and he died there.

WOOLSEY, Theodore Dwight, educator, b. in New York city, 31 Oct., 1801; d. in New Haven, Conn., 1 July, 1889. He was the son of a merchant and of Elizabeth Dwight, sister of President Timothy Dwight, of Yale. He was graduated at Yale in 1820, studied law for a year in Philadelphia, and theology at Princeton in 1821-'3, and from 1823 till 1825 was a tutor at Yale. In 1825 he was licensed to preach, and from 1827 till 1830 he studied the Greek language and literature in Germany, France, and Italy. Returning to this country, he was professor of Greek at Yale from 1831 till 1846, when he was appointed president, which post he held till his resignation in 1871. He was a member of the American company of revisers of the New Testament, and its chairman in 1871-'81, was at one time vice-president of the Oriental society, and for several years a regent of the Smithsonian institution at Washington, D. C. He received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1847, and that of LL. D. from the same institution in 1886. He gave to the Yale library 1,000 volumes in Greek literature. His opinions are regarded as of great weight on questions of international law. He edited the "New Englander" for several years after its first appearance in 1843, and wrote for the "North American," "Princeton Review," and the "Century." He published editions of the Greek text, with English notes for the use of college students, of the "Alcestis" of Euripides (Cambridge, 1834); the "Antigone" of Sophocles (1835); the "Prometheus" of Æschylus (1837); the "Electra" of Sophocles (1837); and the "Gorgias" of Plato (1843); "Introduction to the Study of International Law, designed as an Aid in Teaching and in Historical Studies" (Boston, 1860; 5th ed., enlarged, New York, 1879); "Essays on Divorce and Divorce Legislation, with Special Reference to the United States" (1869); "Religion of the Present and of the Future, Sermons preached chiefly at Yale College" (1871); "Political Science, or the State, Theoretically and Practically considered" (2 vols., 1877); "Communism and Socialism in their History and Theory: a Sketch" (1880); and "Helpful Thoughts for Young Men" (1882). He edited new editions of Francis Lieber's "Civil Liberty and Self-Government" (Philadelphia, 1871), and a "Manual of Politic Ethics" (2 vols., 1871). He also published smaller works, and essays and reviews in magazines. The discourses and addresses at his ordination to the ministry, and his inauguration as President of Yale were published together (New Haven, 1846).—His son, THEODORE SALISBURY, b. in New Haven, Conn., 22 Oct., 1852, was graduated at Yale in 1872, studied abroad in 1874-'6, was graduated at the Yale law-school in 1876, and since 1879 has been professor of international law at Yale law-school.—Theodore Dwight's niece, SARAH CHAUNCEY, author, b. in Cleveland, Ohio, about 1845, has published, under the pen-name of "Susan Coolidge," "The New-Year's Bargain" (Boston, 1871); "What Katy Did" (1872); "Mischiefs Thanksgiving, and other Stories" (1874), besides other books for children; "For Summer Afternoons" (1876); "Verses" (1880); "A Guernsey Lily" (1881); "A Little Country Girl" (1885); and "A Short History of the City of Philadelphia" (1887).

WOOLSON, Abba Louisa Goold, author, b. in Windham, Me., 30 April, 1838. She is the daughter of William Goold, author of "Portland in the Past" (Portland, 1886), and of several historical papers in the "Collections" of the Maine historical society, of which for many years he was corresponding secretary. She passed her early life in Portland, Me., where she was graduated at the high-school for girls in 1856, and the same year married Moses Woolson, its principal. Mrs. Woolson has given courses of lectures in Boston, New York, Washington, and other cities on "English Literature in Connection with English History," "The Influence of Foreign Nations upon English Literature," "Dramas of Shakespeare, as Illustrating English History," and "The Historic Cities of Spain." She resides with her husband in Boston, and is a member of literary and philanthropic societies and president of the Castilian club. She has contributed to periodicals, and published "Woman in American Society" (Boston, 1873); "Browsing among Books" (1881); and "George Eliot and her Heroines" (New York, 1886); and edited "Dress Reform," a series of lectures by female physicians of Boston on "Dress as it affects the Health of Women" (Boston, 1874).

WOOLSON, Constance Fenimore, author, b. in Claremont, N. H., in 1848. She is the daughter of Charles Jarvis Woolson and of Hannah Cooper Pomeroy, who was a niece of James Fenimore Cooper. She removed with her parents to Cleveland, Ohio, in early life, was educated at the young ladies' seminary there, and afterward sent to Madame Chegary's French school in New York city. On the death of her father in 1869 she began to write, and she removed with her mother to the southern states in 1873, where she resided, principally in Florida, till 1879. In that year, on the death of her mother, she went to England, where she has since resided. She has contributed to periodicals, and published "Anne" (New York, 1882);

"For the Major" (1883); "East Angels" (1886); "Rodman the Keeper" (1886); and "Castle Nowhere: Lake-Country Sketches" (1886).

WOOSTER, David, soldier, b. in Stratford, Conn., 2 March, 1710; d. in Danbury, Conn., 2 May, 1777. He was graduated at Yale in 1738, and when war between England and Spain began in 1739 he entered the provincial army as lieutenant, and was subsequently made captain of a vessel that was built and equipped by the colony for the defence of its coasts. In 1745 he served as captain in Col. Aaron Burr's regiment, which participated in the expedition against Louisburg, and commanded the "Connecticut," which conveyed the troops thither. From that place he went, in command of a cartel, to England. He was made a captain under Sir William Pepperell, and received half-pay until 1774. He was appointed colonel in the 3d Connecticut regiment in 1755, and later brigadier-general, and served during the French war, 1756-'63. He was an originator of the expedition that captured Ticonderoga in April, 1775, and afterward served in the Connecticut assembly. On the organization of the Continental army he was appointed one of the eight brigadier-generals, third in rank, and served in Canada, where, after the death of Gen. Richard Montgomery, he held for a time the chief command. He resigned from the army, but on his return to Connecticut he was made the first major-general of the militia of that state. During the winter of 1776-'7 he was employed in raising recruits and provisions for the force that was stationed in Danbury, and was in command of that town when it was attacked by Gov. William Tryon's troops on 26 April, 1777. Tryon, fearing that he might be cut off on his retreat, marched toward Ridgeway, a parish in the town of Ridgefield, and when this movement was known to the American commanders they separated their forces into two parts. The largest division, of 400 men, under Gold Selleck Silliman and Benedict Arnold, was stationed in front of the enemy, while Wooster, with the remaining 200, was sent to annoy the rear-guard. Arnold, on arriving at Ridgefield, constructed a barricade across the highway between the house of Benjamin Stebbins and a ledge of rock to the west of the road, and awaited the enemy's approach. The British, after leaving Danbury, changed their course of retreat, and Wooster hastened forward until he met the foe a few miles north of Ridgefield, fell upon the rear of the British column, and, after a sharp skirmish, took forty prisoners. He made a second assault about a mile north of the Stebbins house. Several discharges of artillery caused the American column to break, and Wooster endeavored to rally his men, exclaiming, "Come on, my boys! Never mind such random shots!" But a musket-ball pierced his body. He was taken to Danbury, where he died a few days afterward. On 17 June, 1777, the Continental congress passed a resolution that a monument be erected to the memory of Gen. Wooster. The sum of $500 was appropriated for this purpose, but the money was never paid, and the grave of the hero soon became unknown. A handsome monument of Portland granite was erected to his memory in Danbury in 1854.—His grandson, Charles Whiting, naval officer, b. in New Haven, Conn., in 1785; d. in California in 1848, entered the merchant service, and during the war with England armed the privateer "Saratoga," with which he captured many prizes, acquiring a fortune. When the Chilians in 1817 were trying to improvise a navy for capturing a Spanish convoy that was expected in Callao by way of Cape Horn, Wooster arrived in Valparaiso with his armed brig "Columbus," which the government bought from him, and, under the name of the "Araucano," placed under the command of Wooster, with the rank of captain. After a fortunate cruise on the coast of Peru and Mexico, his vessel was sent, with the "San Martin," "Chacabuco," and "Lautaro," to capture a convoy of nine transports, escorted by the frigate "Maria Isabel," which was expected from Spain in Talcahuano. On 28 Oct., 1818, they found the frigate in that port, and captured her after a short struggle, Wooster being the first to board her. In recompense he was given command of the prize, and, with four of the transports, captured shortly afterward, the Chilean fleet entered Valparaiso. When Lord Cochrane was given command-in-chief of the Chilean navy in 1819, Wooster, refusing to serve under him, resigned and took command of a merchant-vessel. After Cochrane's departure, Wooster entered the service again in 1822, taking command of his old ship, with the rank of post-captain, and in the following year made a successful cruise on the coast of Peru. He also took part in the campaigns of 1824-'6 against the Chiloe archipelago. In 1829 he was promoted rear-admiral, and, for a long time before, he had been practically commander-in-chief of the small Chilean navy. He went in 1847 to California, where he engaged in mining on Yuba river, but without success.—Gen. Wooster's great-grandnephew, David, physician, b. in Jasper, Steuben co., N. Y., 10 June, 1825, served as acting assistant surgeon in the U. S. army during the Mexican war, being stationed in La Puebla. He was graduated at the Cleveland medical college in 1849, and in that year began the practice of his profession in Adrian, Mich. In 1850 he crossed the plains to California, practised medicine, and was a miner on Yuba river until 1856, when he removed to San Francisco. In 1861-'3 he served as surgeon in the California volunteers in Arizona and New Mexico. From 1867 till 1871 he was U. S. special examiner of drugs in San Francisco, and in 1871-'2 he was surgeon in the U. S. marine hospital of that city, where he still practises his profession. In 1858 he founded "The Pacific Medical and Surgical Journal" in San Francisco, which he edited four years. Besides numerous contributions to this journal and to other medical periodicals, he has published a brochure on "Diphtheria," the first publication in the United States on this disease (1859); "Diseases of the Heart" (1867); a pamphlet on "Hip-Joint Disease" (1876); and a "Genealogy of the Woosters in America" (San Francisco, 1885).

David Wooster

WORCESTER, John, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 Feb., 1834. He became pastor of the New Church society of Newtonville, Mass., in 1869, instructor of theology in the New Church theological school, Boston, in 1878, and its president in 1881. He is the author of "A Year's Lessons from the Psalms" (Boston, 1869); "Correspondences of the Bible: the Animals" (1875; 2d ed., 1884); and "A Journey in Palestine" (1884).

WORCESTER, Joseph Emerson, philologist, b. in Bedford, N. H., 24 Aug., 1784; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 27 Oct., 1865. His father, Jesse Worcester (1761-1834), wrote much for the press, and left in manuscript "Chronicles of Nissitissit." The son worked on a farm in his youth, but cultivated studious habits, determined to obtain a liberal education, and at the age of twenty-five entered Yale, where two years later, 1811, he was graduated. He was a teacher in Salem, Mass., for several years, and passed two years at Andover, but in 1819 removed to Cambridge, which was thenceforth his home. His life was long and quiet, with hardly an incident except the publication of his books. His first work was "A Geographical Dictionary, or Universal Gazetteer. Ancient and Modern" (2 vols., Andover, Mass., 1817), of which he published an enlarged edition in 1823. He also published "A Gazetteer of the United States" (1818); "Elements of Geography, Ancient and Modern" (1819), which passed through several editions; "Sketches of the Earth and its Inhabitants" (1823); "Elements of History, Ancient and Modern, accompanied by an Historical Atlas" (1826), which was used extensively as a text-book; "Epitome of History" (1827); and "Outlines of Scripture Geography" (1828). These works were notable for their accuracy, skilful condensation, and agreeable style. In 1825 Dr. Worcester read before the American academy of sciences a paper on "Longevity and the Expectation of Life in the United States, Relating more Particularly to the State of New Hampshire, with Some Comparative Views in Relation to Foreign Countries," which was published in the "Transactions." His work in lexicography began with an edition of "Johnson's Dictionary, as improved by Todd and abridged by Chalmers, with Walker's Pronouncing Dictionary Combined" (1828). In 1829, much against his inclination, he was induced to prepare an abridgment of Noah Webster's "American Dictionary," and in 1830 he published his own "Comprehensive Pronouncing and Explanatory English Dictionary." The next year he visited Europe, where he collected philological works and kept a journal, which is still in manuscript. From 1831 to 1843 he edited the "American Almanac." In 1846 he published a "Universal and Critical Dictionary of the English Language," of which a pirated edition appeared in London with a garbled preface and a statement on the title-page that it was "compiled from the materials of Noah Webster, LL. D., by Joseph E. Worcester," whereupon Dr. Worcester published a pamphlet exposing the fraud. In 1847-'9 he was unable to use his eyes, but they were restored after he had undergone two operations for cataract. Enlarged editions of his "Comprehensive Dictionary" were issued in 1847, 1849, and 1855. All this work was preparatory to his great quarto "Dictionary of the English Language" (Boston, 1860), in which he had the assistance of many collaborators, especially for the explanations of technical terms. This was the first dictionary that used illustrations. The difference between his system and Webster's, briefly indicated, was this: that Worcester endeavored simply to represent the English language as it was, while Webster tried to improve it and set it forth as he thought it ought to be. The successive editions of Webster's work have receded steadily from his radical plan, so that now there is but little essential difference between the two great dictionaries. Dr. Worcester was retiring, modest, benevolent, and deeply religious. He married, in 1841, Amy Elizabeth, daughter of Prof. Joseph McKean, of Harvard. They had no children. He was a member of numerous learned societies, and received the degree of LL. D. from Brown in 1847 and from Dartmouth in 1856. Ezra Abbott prepared a memoir of him, which was read before the American academy of sciences the year after his death.

WORCESTER, Noah, clergyman, b. in Hollis, N. H., 25 Nov., 1758; d. in Brighton, Mass., 31 Oct., 1837. He was descended from Rev. William Worcester, who came from Salisbury, England, and was the first minister of the church in Salisbury, Mass., which was organized in 1638. Noah's father, of the same name, was one of the framers of the constitution of New Hampshire. The son was a fifer in the Continental army in 1775, entered the service again for a short time as fife-major in 1777, and was at the battles of Bunker Hill and Bennington. In September, 1778, he removed to Plymouth, N. H., where he taught, and in February, 1782, settled at Thornton, filling several local offices, and was chosen to the legislature. Having turned his attention to theology, he published a "Letter to the Rev. John Murray Concerning the Origin of Evil" (Newburyport, 1786), was licensed to preach by a Congregational association in 1786, and in 1787 was ordained pastor of the church in Thornton, where he remained till 1802, receiving a salary of $200. In 1802 he was employed as its first missionary in the New Hampshire society then organized, and in that capacity preached and travelled extensively through the northern part of the state. He removed to Salisbury, N. H., in 1810, and there supplied the pulpit of his brother Thomas till 1813, when he settled at Brighton, Mass. He edited the "Christian Disciple" in 1813-'18, and "The Friend of Peace," a quarterly magazine, in 1819-'29, founded the Massachusetts peace society in 1815, and was its secretary till 1828. Mr. Worcester received honorary degrees in arts from Dartmouth in 1791, and that of D. D. from Harvard in 1818. In addition to his editorial work he contributed to the "Theological Magazine," and published "Familiar Dialogue between Cephas and Bereas" (Worcester, 1792); "Solemn Reasons for Declining to adopt the Baptist Theory and Practice" (Charlestown, 1809); "Bible News, or Sacred Truths Relating to the Living God, his only Son, and Holy Spirit," which was censured by the Hopkinton association, of which the author was a member, as unsound on the doctrine of the Trinity (Concord, 1810); "Impartial Review of the Testimonies in Favor of the Divinity of the Son of God" (1810); "Respectful Address to the Trinitarian Clergy" (Boston, 1812); "Solemn Review of the Custom of War, by Philo Pacificus," which was republished in Europe in several languages (1814); "The Atoning Sacrifice: a Display of Love, not of Wrath" (Cambridge, 1829); "The Causes and Evils of Contentions among Christians" (Boston, 1831); "Last Thoughts on Important Subjects" (Cambridge, 1833); and single sermons and tracts. See "Memoirs of Noah Worcester, D. D.," by Rev. Henry Ware, Jr., D. D., with a preface, notes, and a concluding chapter by Samuel Worcester (Boston, 1844).—His brother, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Hollis, N. H., 22 Nov., 1768; d. 24 Dec., 1831, having studied theology under the direction of Rev. Daniel Emerson, of Hollis, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Salisbury, N. H., 9 Nov., 1791. He adopted the Unitarian views of his brother Noah, and this, together with his impaired health, led to his dismissal, 24 April, 1823, by a mutual council. He remained afterward without a pastoral charge. He received the honorary degree of M. A. from Dartmouth college in 1806. Mr. Worcester published "A Call for Scripture Evidence that Christ is the Self-Existent Eternal God" (Boston, 1811); "New Chain of Plain Argument Deemed Conclusive against Trinitarianism" (1817); "The True God but one Person" (1819); and separate sermons.—Another brother, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Hollis, N. H., 1 Nov., 1770; d. in Brainard, Tenn., 7 June, 1821, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1795, licensed to preach in 1796, and was pastor of the Congregational church in Fitchburg, Mass., from 1797 till 1802. He became pastor of the Tabernacle church, Salem, in 1803, which charge he held till his death. He declined the professorship of theology in Dartmouth in 1804, became corresponding secretary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions in 1810, and in 1815 engaged in the Unitarian controversy, his immediate opponent being the Rev. William E. Channing. At the time of his death he was travelling for the benefit of his health. He published "Discourses on the Covenant with Abraham" (Salem, 1805); "Three Letters to the Rev. William E. Channing on Unitarianism" (Boston, 1815); "Watts's Entire and Select Hymns" (1818); single sermons and pamphlets; and reviews and essays in religious periodicals. After his death a collection of his sermons was published (1823). See "Life and Labors of Rev. Samuel Worcester," by his son, Rev. Samuel M. Worcester (2 vols., Boston, 1852).—Samuel's son, Samuel Melancthon, b. in Fitchburg, Mass., 4 Sept., 1801; d. in Boston, 16 Aug., 1866, was graduated at Harvard in 1822, studied for a year at Andover, was a tutor in Amherst in 1823-'5, and professor of rhetoric and oratory there from 1825 till 1834. He was pastor of the Tabernacle church, Salem, from 1834 till 1860, when impaired health caused him to resign. He was a member of the Massachusetts senate and house of representatives. Mr. Worcester published "Essays on Slavery, by Vigorinus" (1826); "The Memorial of the Old and New Tabernacle," Salem, Mass. (Boston, 1855); the life of his father that has been mentioned; single sermons and discourses; and articles in religious periodicals.—Noah's son, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Thornton, N. H., 15 April, 1795; d. in Waltham, Mass., 12 Aug., 1878, was graduated at Harvard in 1818, and spent two years and a half at the divinity-school, but embraced Swedenborgian tenets, and was the first clergyman of that faith in Massachusetts, serving as pastor of the Boston society of the New Jerusalem church from 1821 till 1867. He was president of the Massachusetts association of his denomination, and also of its general convention from 1839 till 1875. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1856, and he was one of its overseers in 1854-'60. He published sermons, addresses, and magazine articles.

WORCESTER, Noah, educator, b. in Thornton, N. H., in 1812; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 4 April, 1847. He was graduated at Harvard in 1832, was afterward a tutor at Dartmouth, became professor of general pathology in Western Reserve college, Ohio, and was eminent as a physician. He published "Symptoms, Diagnosis, and Treatment of Diseases of the Skin" (Philadelphia, 1844).

WORDEN, John Lorimer, naval officer, b. in Westchester county, N. Y., 12 March, 1818. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 12 Jan., 1835, attended the naval school at Philadelphia in 1840, and became a passed midshipman on 16 July of that year. He was promoted to lieutenant, 30 Nov., 1846, and served on various vessels and at the naval observatory till the civil war. In April, 1861, he delivered the orders from the secretary of the navy by which Fort Pickens was saved for the Union, and upon his attempt to return to the north overland he was arrested and confined as a prisoner of war for seven months. When he was exchanged he was ordered to superintend the completion of John Ericsson's "Monitor," and appointed to take command. He left New York hastily in this vessel, and after experiencing great danger arrived at Hampton Roads. On 8 March, 1862, the iron-clad ram "Merrimac" had come down from Norfolk and had sunk the "Congress" and the "Cumberland." Worden anchored alongside of the "Minnesota," then aground on the shoal, and prepared to defend the fleet when the "Merrimac" reappeared. Early the next morning, 9 March, the ram prepared to attack the "Minnesota," but when she was within a mile of the ship the "Monitor" steamed out. The "Merrimac" fired broadsides upon the "Monitor," but all the shots that struck her turret glanced off; the "Monitor" fired deliberately about every seven minutes, every shot taking effect. Worden endeavored to get as close as possible, while the "Merrimac" fired as rapidly as the guns could be served. The duel continued for more than two hours, when the "Merrimac" attempted to ram the "Monitor," but Worden avoided the blow by manœuvring, so that the ram glanced off. Worden had orders not to use heavy charges, as the eleven-inch guns were considered too weak for more than fifteen-pound charges, with which he could not penetrate the "Merrimac's" heavy armor. At 11.30 A. M. a shell exploded on the pilot-house of the "Monitor" while Worden was looking through the slit, and the powder and flame was driven into his eyes, rendering him blind and helpless. (See GREENE, SAMUEL DANA.) Lieut. Greene, the second in command, continued the action; but the "Merrimac" soon withdrew to Norfolk. It was a drawn battle, but the "Merrimac" was prevented from accomplishing her purpose of destroying the National fleet and eventually securing the independence of the Confederates by capturing Washington, New York, and other cities, as had been expected. Honors were showered upon Worden for this service. Congress gave him a vote of thanks, 11 July, 1862, and again on 3 Feb., 1863, and recommended him to be advanced one grade for his conduct in this conflict. He was commissioned a commander, 12 July, 1862, and, in accordance with the second vote of thanks, was promoted to captain, 3 Feb., 1863. He recovered from the injuries to his eyes, and commanded the monitor "Montauk," in the South Atlantic blockading squadron, from January till June, 1863. In order to test the ability of the monitors to withstand heavy gun-fire from forts, Worden was sent to engage Fort McAllister, at Genesee point, on Ogeechee river, and reported that he was convinced they could do so. In this expedition he destroyed the Confederate privateer "Nashville," which had taken shelter under the guns of Fort McAllister. He participated in the blockade of Charleston, and in the attack on the forts of Charleston by Admiral Dupont's squadron on 7 April, 1863. After receiving his promotion to captain, he was on duty at New York connected with the iron-clads in 1863-'6. He commanded the "Pensacola," in the Pacific squadron, in 1866-'7, and was on special duty in 1868. He was promoted to commodore, 27 May, 1868, and was superintendent of the naval academy in 1870-'4. He was commissioned a rear-admiral, 20 Nov., 1872, was commander-in-chief of the European squadron from 3 Feb., 1875, till 23 Dec., 1877, and then served as member of the examining board and president of the retiring board until 23 Dec., 1886. As he had received two votes of thanks from congress, he was retained by operation of law on the active list until he should have had fifty-five years of service, but he was retired with the highest sea-pay of his grade, at his own request, by special act of congress, 23 Dec., 1886.

WORK, Henry Clay, song-writer, b. in Middletown, Conn., 1 Oct., 1832; d. in Hartford, Conn., 8 June, 1884. He was the son of Alanson Work, who was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment in 1841 in Missouri for assisting fugitive slaves to escape. While young the son removed with his father to Illinois, where he received a common-school education. He returned to Connecticut, was apprenticed to a printer, and employed his leisure in studying harmony. His first success was achieved during the civil war, when he sprang into favor by his war-songs, among which were "Kingdom Coming," "Marching through Georgia," and "Babylon is Fallen." His songs number nearly one hundred, and include "Nicodemus the Slave," "Lily Dale," and "My Grandfather's Clock." He went to Europe in 1865, and on his return invested the fortune that his songs had brought him in a fruit-raising enterprise in Vineland, N. J., which was a failure. In 1875 he became connected as composer with Root and Cady, the music-publishers, who had published Work's songs until the plates were destroyed by the Chicago fire of 1871. Mr. Work was also an inventor, and patented a knitting-machine, a walking doll, and a rotary engine.

WORKMAN, Thomas, Canadian merchant, b. near Lisburn, County Antrim, Ireland, 17 June, 1813. He emigrated to Canada in 1827, served during the rebellion of 1837-'8, was present at the battle of St. Eustache, and was made a lieutenant in March, 1838. He entered the employ of a hardware firm in Montreal in 1834, with which he has retained his connection, and he is now its senior partner. He has been for more than thirty years a member of the board of directors of Molson's bank, Montreal, and for many years its president, and is a life-governor of the Fraser institute and Free library, to the establishment of which he contributed liberally, as he has also to McGill university and to many other public institutions in Montreal. Mr. Workman was unanimously elected to the Dominion parliament in 1867 for Montreal centre, and declined renomination, but was again elected in 1875 for Montreal west.

WORMAN, James Henry, author, b. in Prussia, 28 Feb., 1835. He was educated at the University of Berlin and at the Sorbonne, Paris, taking his degree in both institutions in 1864, came to the United States in 1865, and became professor of modern languages in Knox college, Galesburg, Ill. In 1867 he was appointed librarian and instructor in Drew theological seminary, Madison, N. J., and on the death of Dr. John McClintock he became one of the editors of "McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature." He was a teacher in Adelphi academy, Brooklyn, N. Y., from 1877 till 1883, and then a professor in Vanderbilt university till 1886. He officiated at the same time as professor in Chautauqua university from 1878 till 1885, and since that date has been director of the Southern Chautauqua and Round Lake branch. In 1886 he edited the "Saratogian," and since 1887 he has been editor of "Outing." Dr. Worman published a school-book on universal history before coming to this country (Berlin, 1862), and has since published many books for language instruction. He was the first to introduce the method of writing books of instruction entirely in the language to be learned, interpreting the meaning by means of illustrations, and has applied it to German, French, Spanish, and Latin.

WORMELEY, Mary Elizabeth, author, b. in London, England, 26 July, 1822. Her father, Admiral Ralph Randolph Wormeley, of the British navy, a native of Virginia (1785-1852), had for some time preceding his death resided in Boston, Mass., and was grandson, on the mother's side, of Attorney-General John Randolph. Her mother was a niece of Com. Edward Preble, U. S. navy. The daughter resided several years in Newport, R. I., and, after gaining a reputation as a writer, married Randolph Latimer, of Baltimore. She has contributed to magazines, and published "Forest Hill: a Tale of Social Life in 1830-'1" (3 vols., London, 1846); "Amabel, a Family History" (New York, 1853); "Our Cousin Veronica" (1856); and "Familiar Talks on Some of Shakespeare's Comedies" (Boston, 1887); also translations of Louis Ulbach's "Madame Gosselin" (New York, 1878); "The Steel Hammer" (1888); and "For Fifteen Years" (1888).—Her sister, Katharine Prescott, author, b. in Suffolk, England, 14 July, 1832, took an active interest in the relief of the National soldiers during the civil war, and published "The U. S. Sanitary Commission" (Boston, 1863). A volume of her letters from the headquarters of the U. S. sanitary commission with the Army of the Potomac during the peninsular campaign in 1862 has been published by the Massachusetts commandery of the Loyal legion under the title of "The Other Side of War" (1888). She is best known as the American translator of Honoré de Balzac's novels, of which thirteen volumes have been issued (Boston, 1886-'9), among which the "Magic Skin," "Louis Lambert," and "Séraphita," have introductions by George Frederic Parsons.—Another sister, Ariana Randolph, b. in Suffolk, England, 14 Oct., 1835, married Daniel Sargent Curtis, of Boston. She has published a comedy entitled "The Coming Woman, or the Spirit of '76" (Boston, 1870), that has been acted in public and private both in the United States and in Europe.

WORMLEY, Théodore George, chemist, b. in Wormleysburg, Pa., 1 April, 1826. He was educated at Dickinson college, but left without graduation to study medicine, and in 1849 received his degree at the Philadelphia medical college. In 1852 he was called to the chair of chemistry and natural sciences at Capital university, Columbus, Ohio, which he held until 1865, and was also professor of chemistry and toxicology in Starling medical college in 1854-'77. On the resignation of Prof. Robert E. Rogers in 1877, he was called to the chair of chemistry and toxicology in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, which place he still holds. During 1867-'75 he was state gas commissioner of Ohio, and in 1867-'74 he was chemist to the Ohio geological survey. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by Dickinson college, and that of LL. D. by Marietta, both in 1870. He is a member of the American philosophical society, a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and a member of other societies. Prof. Wormley was appointed a member of the Centennial medical commission, having in charge the arrangements for the International medical congress of 1876, and was a delegate therefrom to the International medical congress at Philadelphia in September, 1876. He delivered an address before that body on "Medical Chemistry and Toxicology." In 1862-'4 he edited the "Ohio Medical and Surgical Journal," and he published in the "Chemical News" of London a series of papers on the "Chemical Reactions of Strychnine" (1859); "Atropine," "Brucine," "Morphia," "Narcotine and Meconic Acid," "Corrosive Sublimate," "Veratrine" (1860); "Nicotine and Daturine," "Solanine," "Codeine, Meconine, Narceine, and Aconitine" (1861); "Conine" (1862); and "Oxalic Acid" (1863). Prof. Wormley is the author of "Methods of Analysis of Coals, Iron Ores, Furnace Slags, Fire Clays, Limestones, and of Soils" (1870), has contributed reports to the "Geological Survey of Ohio" (Columbus, 1871), and has also published "The Micro-Chemistry of Poisons" (New York, 1867).

WORTH, Jonathan, governor of North Carolina, b. in Guilford county, N. C., 18 Nov., 1802; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 5 Sept., 1869. He was educated at the common schools and at Greensborough academy, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1825. He soon afterward settled at Asheborough, Randolph co., and engaged in practice. He was a member of the North Carolina legislature in 1829-'34, and during the height of the nullification excitement introduced in 1831 a resolution into the house of commons of the state denouncing it in the strongest terms. He was also for several terms a member of the state senate, and opposed secession both in the legislature and in appeals to his constituents; but after his state had seceded he gave his adhesion to the Confederate government. He was a member of the lower house of the legislature from 1862 till the end of the war, and was public treasurer of the state during the same period. When a provisional government was organized in North Carolina by President Johnson, Mr. Worth was reappointed state treasurer, which post he resigned soon afterward, and became a candidate for governor. He was elected and served from 1865 till 1868, when the existing state government was superseded by the one that was organized under the reconstruction act of congress.

WORTH, William Jenkins, soldier, b. in Hudson, N. Y., 1 March, 1794; d. in San Antonio, Tex., 17 May, 1849. He was of Quaker ancestry, and of a family that produced many well-known men, among others Judge John Worth Edmunds, Gorham Worth, and Lawrence Worth, president of the Park bank. Young Worth received only a common-school education, and in early life entered a store in Hudson, whence he soon removed to Albany, where he continued in mercantile pursuits till he was eighteen years of age. On the opening of war with Great Britain he applied for a commission in the army, and on 19 March, 1813, received the appointment of 1st lieutenant in the 23d infantry. He served as aide to Gen. Winfield Scott, and for gallantry was promoted to the rank of captain, 19 Aug., 1814. In the battle of Niagara he again so distinguished himself as to receive the thanks of his general and the rank of major. At the close of the war he was appointed superintendent of the U. S. military academy, and in 1824 was brevetted lieutenant-colonel. In 1838 he became colonel of the 8th infantry. In the Florida war he was especially active, fighting the battle of Palaklakhah, 19 April, 1842, in which the Seminoles were disastrously defeated. He was second in command to Gen. Zachary Taylor at the opening of the war with Mexico, leading the van of his army, and being the first to plant, with his own hand, the flag of the United States on the Rio Grande. Under Taylor he conducted the negotiations for the capitulation of Matamoras, and by him was intrusted with the assault on the bishop's palace at Monterey. It was a hazardous undertaking, the cannon having to be dragged up precipitous cliffs, and throughout the action his troops were exposed to the heaviest fire, but he achieved it with a small loss of life, and escaped personal injury, though constantly on horseback passing from post to post during the entire action. He was subsequently ordered to the Gulf coast to join Gen. Scott, and was under him engaged in all the battles from Vera Cruz to Mexico, having a principal part in the capture of the important city of Puebla, and being the first to enter the city of Mexico, where, with his own hand, he cut down the Mexican flag that waved from the National palace. After the war he was placed in command of the Department of Texas, and there he died of cholera. He was a man of tall and commanding figure, and said to be the best horseman and handsomest man in the army. He was of a manly, generous nature, and possessed talents that would have won him distinction in any sphere of action. He was brevetted major-general for his services at Monterey, and given swords by congress, the states of New York and Louisiana, and his native county, Columbia. A monument was erected to his memory by the city of New York at the junction of Broadway and Fifth avenue. (See vignette.)—Thomas, caricaturist, b. in New York, 12 Feb., 1834, is the son of a cousin of Gen. William J. Worth. He was with his father in banking business for a few years after leaving school, but soon devoted himself entirely to art. He first came prominently before the public in 1862, with his illustrations to "Plutarch Restored." He illustrated also some of the books of "Orpheus C. Kerr," the edition of Dickens's "Old Curiosity Shop" that was published by the Harpers in 1878, and numerous other works. He is best known to the general public by his lithographed caricatures, many of them on sporting subjects or scenes in negro life; and he has furnished pictures for every illustrated paper of note in the country. At present he is on the staff of "Texas Sittings."

WORTHEN, Amos Henry, geologist, b. in Bradford, Vt., 31 Oct., 1813; d. in Warsaw, Ill., 6 May, 1888. He was educated at Bradford academy and emigrated to Kentucky in 1834, where he taught. In 1836 he settled in Warsaw, Ill., which continued to be his principal residence until his death. There he engaged in the forwarding and commission business, and later in the dry-goods trade. His attention was early directed to the geological features of his western home, and he collected specimens of the sedimentary rocks of that region, especially the geode formations that there existed in abundance. In 1842, owing to the financial depression on account of the Mormon disturbances in the west, he withdrew from business and spent two years in Boston, where he exchanged his minerals for a cabinet of sea-shells. On his return to Warsaw in 1844 he resumed his collecting, and, by comparing the fossil specimens with his shells, he became an expert palæontologist. As his cabinet increased it attracted the attention of scientists, and by means of exchanges it grew to include forms from other parts of the country. In 1851 he became assistant on the newly established geological survey of Illinois, and in 1855 accepted a similar office in the survey of Iowa under James Hall, who intrusted him with reporting on the palæontology of that state. This place he held until 1858, when he was appointed state geologist of Illinois and continued in the work of the survey until 1877, when the office was abolished. Meanwhile he associated with himself representative men in special fields of science, assigning the descriptions of plants to Leo Lesquereux, the vertebrate palæontology to John S. Newberry, the invertebrate palæontology to Fielding B. Meek, and geology to Garland C. Broadhead and Edward T. Cox, and it resulted in the publication of his reports on the "Geological Survey of Illinois" (8 vols., Springfield, 1866-'88). In 1877 he was appointed curator of the State historical library and natural history museum, which office he held until his death. In this capacity he gathered an extensive variety of minerals and fossils which he classified, and also furnished numerous collections to different colleges in the state. Mr. Worthen was elected to the National academy of science in 1872, and in 1874 was made a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, besides membership in other American and foreign scientific bodies. His writings were confined to professional papers and the reports of the surveys.

WORTHEN, William Ezra, civil engineer, b. in Amesbury, Mass., 14 March, 1819. He is the son of Ezra Worthen, who was the first to suggest the present site of the city of Lowell as a desirable locality for manufacturing, and who was the first superintendent of the Merrimac mills. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1838, and at once began the practice of civil engineering. Beginning under George R. Baldwin, C. E., with surveys and measurements of brook-flows for the increase of the Jamaica-pond supply for the city of Boston, he continued hydraulic investigations and works under James B. Francis, C. E., of Lowell, until 1848, with an intermediate employment in 1840-'2 on the surveys and construction of the Albany and West Stockbridge railroad. Removing to New York in 1849, he did architectural work, and became the engineer of the New York and New Haven railroad, and in 1854 its vice-president. As a hydraulic engineer, he has designed and constructed masonry dams across rivers, for the establishment of water-powers, and the canals, mills, and shops connected therewith. For the water-supply and sewers of towns he has given designs for all the constructions and has supervised their execution. He has tested the large pumping-engines of Brooklyn, Lawrence, Jersey City, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and Milwaukee, and has also given designs for and constructed pumping-engines. In the city of New York he was the sanitary engineer of the Metropolitan board of health, during its continuance in 1866-'9, engineer of the Southern boulevard, member of the examining board on the new docks and bulkheads, engineer of the first rapid-transit commission in the annexed district, member of a later commission, and member of examining board on the Riverside park and Fifth avenue pavement. In Brooklyn he has been consulted, and, with the engineer of the board of city works, has reported on an extensive addition to the system of sewers. He has been the consulting engineer of many of the large water-power companies, has measured the quantity of water used by different lessees, and reported on the condition and capacity of the works. Mr. Worthen is a member of several scientific societies, and was president of the American society of civil engineers in 1887. In addition to numerous official reports, he has published a "Cyclopædia of Drawing" (New York, 1857); "First Lessons in Mechanics" (1862); and "Rudimentary Drawing for Schools" (1863).

WORTHINGTON, Erastus, lawyer, b. in Belchertown, Mass., 8 Oct., 1779; d. in Dedham, Mass., 27 June, 1842. He was graduated at Williams in 1804, admitted to the bar, practised at Dedham from 1809 till 1825, and was a member of the general court in 1814-'15. He published an oration on "Recent Measures of the American Government" that he delivered at Dedham, 4 July, 1809; "An Essay on the Establishment of a Chancery Jurisdiction in Massachusetts" (1810); and "History of Dedham, from the Beginning of its Settlement in 1635 to May, 1827" (Boston, 1827).

WORTHINGTON, George, P. E. bishop, b. in Lenox, Mass., 14 Oct., 1848. He was graduated at Hobart in 1860, and at the General theological seminary, New York, in 1863, ordered deacon in June, 1863, and ordained priest in 1864. He served as an assistant at St. Paul's church, Troy, N. Y., and then became rector of Christ church, Ballston Spa, N. Y., but soon removed to St. John's church, Detroit, Mich., where he remained as rector for seventeen years. He was for several years president of the diocesan standing committee, and examining chaplain and deputy to the general convention. He was elected twice by the vote of the clergy to the episcopate of Michigan, but the laity refused to confirm him. In 1883 the house of bishops elected him missionary bishop of Shanghai, China, but he declined. Upon the death of Bishop Clarkson in 1884 he was chosen bishop of Nebraska, and was consecrated to that office in St. John's church, Detroit, 24 Feb., 1885. He has received the degrees of D. D. and LL. D. from Hobart in 1876 and 1885, respectively.

WORTHINGTON, Henry Rossiter, inventor, b. in New York city, 17 Dec., 1817; d. in Tarrytown, N. Y., 17 Dec., 1880. He early engaged in business with his father, a merchant in New York city, and about 1840 began experimenting with steam for the propulsion of canal-boats. Among the difficulties to be overcome was the maintaining of a supply of water within the boiler while the engine was not in motion, as when the boat was passing through locks. The method in use at this time was a hand-pump, and he conceived the idea of compelling the idle boiler to furnish power to supply its own water. For this purpose he devised a small steam cylinder with an attached pump, which, without the use of shaft, crank, and fly-wheel, produced a movement of its own slide-valve. In 1841 he patented the independent feed-pump, which developed into the direct-acting steam-pump that he patented in 1849. In 1854 he erected in Savannah the first direct-acting compound condensing engine that was ever built and the first compound engine that was ever used in water-works. The success of this led to the subsequent adoption of similar engines throughout the country. The invention of the duplex pump followed, and consists of an arrangement of two pumps working side by side. It is now largely used for supplying water in cities and towns and in mills and factories, as well as on steamers, where it is used to feed boilers, extinguish fires, and for similar purposes. Mr. Worthington built up a large plant for the manufacture of pumping machinery, and he ranks as a pioneer in that branch of hydraulic engineering. He was a member of the American institute of mining engineers and one of the founders of the American society of mechanical engineers.

WORTHINGTON, Thomas, governor of Ohio, b. near Charleston, Va. (now W. Va.), 16 July, 1773; d. in New York city, 20 June, 1827. He received a good education, but was a common sailor in 1790-'3. In 1797 he removed to Ross county, Ohio, where he was a member of the territorial legislature in 1799-1801, and a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1803. He was elected one of the first U. S. senators from Ohio, as a Democrat, serving from 17 Oct., 1803, till 3 March, 1807, and again elected instead of Return Jonathan Meigs, Jr., who had resigned, serving from 8 Jan., 1811, till 1814, when he resigned. He was governor of Ohio in 1814-'18, a canal commissioner from 1818 till his death, and one of the original vice-presidents of the American Bible society. He contributed greatly to the development of his adopted state.

WOUVERMAN, Simon van, Flemish author, b. in Bruges in 1690; d. in Paris in 1743. Little is known of his early life except that he was in the employ of the West Indian company about 1724, and afterward of the Mississippi company. In 1740 he secured an employment in the latter company's office at Paris, where he died. He wrote two curious works, "Histoire philosophique et morale de la Louisiane" and "Système d'administration de la compagnie des Indes," which found afterward their way into Holland, where they were published (3 vols., Amsterdam, 1752). They contained grave accusations against the Louisiana and West Indian companies, which appear to have secured recruits and immigrants by false promises, and, when these means failed, to have shipped to America young convicts and women of questionable character. Wouwerman's works caused a scandal at the time of their publication, and all available copies were bought and destroyed by order of the officials of the company. Abbé Prévost, in his noted "Manon Lescaut," mentions that it was the custom of the company to send criminals to the American colonies.

WRAGG, William, lawyer, b. in South Carolina in 1714; d. at sea in September, 1777. He was of Huguenot descent, and was educated in England, where he studied law. After returning to South Carolina, he served for many years in the assembly and in the council. In 1759 he declined the appointment of chief justice of the colony, that he might give evidence to those whose political course he opposed without being charged with acting in hope of official distinction. His sense of duty prevented his espousing the cause of independence, and, on refusing to take the oath prescribed by the Provincial congress, he was banished. He sailed for England in the summer of 1777, but was shipwrecked off the coast of Holland. He possessed a fortune, and was much esteemed. A monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey. He published "Reasons for not concurring in the Non-Importation Resolution" (1769).

WRANGEL, Charles Magnus von, clergyman, b. in Sweden about 1730; d. in Sala, Sweden, in 1786. He was a descendant of an illustrious Swedish general, and was educated at Vestrås and the University of Upsala, in 1757 received the degree of D. D. from Göttingen university, and was then immediately nominated as court preacher to the king of Sweden. In 1759 he was called to the provostship of the Swedish churches in this country, and arrived at Philadelphia in the same year. He at once took charge of the Wicaco parish and the oversight of all the Swedish Lutheran congregations in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. He was one of the most zealous and successful laborers in the Swedish churches. According to the instruction of the archbishop of Sweden, he cordially and actively co-operated with the German ministers in the defence of their common faith and the extension of the Lutheran church in America, and under this salutary influence both parties were perfectly united and frequently met in conference for consultation and in synod for the transaction of business pertaining to the welfare of the German and Swedish churches. He was an indefatigable worker and an eloquent preacher. When the weather permitted, he was usually obliged, in consequence of the crowds, to preach in the open air. Besides attending to the duties of his own parish, he built two new churches for the Swedes—one at Kingessing, under the name of St. James church, the other at Upper Merion, under the name of Christ church—and in 1765 obtained a charter from Richard Thomas Penn for the "United Swedish Lutheran churches of Wicaco, Kingessing, and Upper Merion." He also visited the Germans at Lancaster and York. He often preached in English, since he found that the young could understand that language better than either Swedish or German. He also prepared an improved English translation of Luther's small catechism for the use of his young people. The church in which Dr. Wrangel labored is "Gloria Dei Church," or the "Old Swedes Church," on Swanson and Christian streets, Philadelphia. The building in which he preached is still in good preservation, and is one of the oldest buildings in Philadelphia. The first house of worship was a block-house, erected in 1669, and was used by Swedish Lutherans both as a defence against the Indians and as a place of worship. On 2 July, 1700, the new Gloria Dei church was dedicated and was used by Lutherans for nearly a hundred years, but in the latter part of the eighteenth century it passed into the hands of Episcopalians. The church is sixty feet long and thirty feet wide, built of brick, every alternate brick being glazed. (See illustration.) After nine years' faithful service, Dr. Wrangel returned to Sweden in 1768, and received from the government the pastorate of Sala, where he died, after a useful and eminently successful career.

WRANGELL, Ferdinand Petrovitch, Baron von, Russian navigator, b. in Pleskau, Esthonia, 29 Dec., 1796; d. in Dorpat, Livonia, 10 June, 1870. He was educated in the school for cadets at St. Petersburg, entered the naval services in 1812, and was attached to the scientific expedition to Siberia and Kamtchatka in 1817. He was appointed in 1820 to command an expedition to explore the Russian polar seas. Sailing from St. Petersburg, he arrived, on 2 Nov., 1820, at Nijnii-Kolymsk, and performed, early in 1821, a remarkable journey to Cape Schelagin on sledges drawn by dogs. He sailed afterward up Kolyma river, advancing about 125 miles into the interior, through the territory inhabited by the warlike Yakutes. On 10 March, 1822, he resumed his journey northward, and travelled forty-six days on the ice, reaching 72° 2' north latitude. He left Nijnii-Kolymsk on 1 Nov., 1823, and arrived at St. Petersburg, 15 Aug., 1824. In 1825 Wrangell, who had been promoted commander, made a journey around the world on the sloop-of-war "Kratkoi," and on his return to Kronstadt in 1827 was appointed governor of Russian America (now Alaska). He repaired to his post early in 1829, by way of Siberia and Kamtchatka, and on his arrival devoted all his energy to developing the resources of the country. After thoroughly reforming the administration, he introduced the culture of the potato, opened and regulated the working of several mines, and urged upon the home government the organization of a fur company. He foresaw also the great future of the country, endeavored to induce capitalists to invest money there, and sent missionaries to the remotest districts. He likewise began a survey of the country, opened roads, built bridges and government buildings, and promoted the civilization and improvement of the natives. He also made valuable geographical and ethnographical observations, which he embodied in a memoir to the navy department. Being recalled in 1834, Wrangell made his return by way of the Isthmus of Panama and the United States, where he visited several cities. He was promoted rear-admiral in 1837, and made director of the ship-timber department in the navy office, which post he held for twelve years. He became vice-admiral in 1847, but resigned in 1849, and temporarily severed his connection with the navy to assume the presidency of the newly reorganized Russian American company. He was always opposed to the cession of Alaska to the United States, and wrote several memoirs upon the subject. In 1854 he re-entered active service and was made chief director of the hydrographical department of the navy, chief assistant in 1855 to the high admiral, Grand Duke Constantine, member of the counsel of the empire in 1858, and in 1859 admiral and general aide-de-camp to the czar, Alexander II. The continent that Wrangell sought was discovered in 1855 by the English navigator, Capt. Thomas Long, and is named Wrangell Land. An account of the physical observations during his first journey was published in German (Berlin, 1827), and also in German extracts from Wrangell's journals, "Reise laengs der Nordküste von Sibirien und auf dem Eismeere in den Jahren 1820-'4" (2 vols., Berlin, 1839), which was translated into English as "Wrangell's Expedition to the Polar Sea" (2 vols., London, 1840), but the complete report of the expedition appeared two years later: "Otseschewie do Sjewernym beregam Sibiri, po Ledowitomm More" (2 vols., St. Petersburg, 1841), and was immediately translated into French with notes by Prince Galitzin, under the title "Voyage sur les côtes septentrionales de la Sibirie et de la mer glaciale" (2 vols., 1841). From the French version an English one was made under the title "A Journey on the Northern Coast of Siberia and the Icy Sea" (2 vols., London, 1841). He also published "Otscherk puti is Sitchi w' S. Petersburg" (1836; French translation under the title "Journal de voyage de Sitka à Saint Pétersbourg" (Paris, 1836; English version from the French, entitled "Journal of a Voyage from Sitka to St. Petersburg," London, 1837); and "Nachrichten über die Russischen Besitzungen an der Nordwestküste America's" (2 vols., St. Petersburg, 1839), better known by the French version, "Renseignements statistiques et ethnographiques sur les possessions Russes de la côte Nord-Ouest de l'Amérique" (Paris, 1839), which was translated into English under the title "Statistical and Ethnographical Notices on the Russian Possessions in North America" (London, 1841).

WREE, Oliver van der (vray), Dutch soldier, b. in Charleroi, near the end of the 16th century; d. in Amsterdam in 1649. He accompanied in 1637 Prince Maurice of Nassau to Brazil as secretary, and assisted in all the stages of the conquest of the northern provinces of the country. In 1644 he was sent by Gen. Sigismond, the new commander-in-chief, to the Portuguese viceroy, but was detained as hostage, despite his character of ambassador. He was exchanged a few years later, and on his return to Holland published a very interesting work, in which he recounts his captivity and the events he witnessed, and gives curious details regarding the Indians and negroes, and the administration of Brazil. It is entitled "Epistola in carcere unde erupit scripta, 17 August, 1647" (Amsterdam, 1649).

WRIGHT, Adam Henry, Canadian physician, b. in Brampton, Ont., 6 April, 1846. He was graduated at the University college, Toronto, in 1866, and received the degree of M. B. there in 1873, and from the Royal college of surgeons in England in 1877. He was demonstrator of normal histology in the Toronto school of medicine from 1879 till 1887, surgeon-general of the Toronto hospital in 1882-'3, lecturer in the Woman's medical college in 1883-'6, and since 1887 has been professor of obstetrics in the University of Toronto, which gave him the degree of M. D. in 1888.

WRIGHT, Alonzo, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Hull, Lower Canada, 26 Feb., 1825. He is a grandson of Philemon Wright, of Woburn, Mass., who removed to Canada in 1797, founded the village of Hull, and was the first representative of the county of Ottawa in the Lower Canada assembly. The grandson was educated at Potsdam academy, N. Y., became a farmer, and is lieutenant-colonel of the Ottawa county reserve militia. He was a representative in the Canada assembly from 1862 till 1867, when he was elected to the Dominion parliament by acclamation, re-elected by acclamation in 1872, and again returned in 1874, 1878, and in 1887.

WRIGHT, Ambrose Ransom, soldier, b. in Louisville, Jefferson co., Ga., 26 April, 1826; d. 21 Dec., 1872. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and entered politics as a Democrat, but subsequently joined the Know-Nothing party. He supported the Bell and Everett ticket in 1860, and after its defeat espoused the cause of secession. He was sent by the convention of Georgia as commissioner to Maryland to induce that state to join the movement. He enlisted as a private soldier in the Confederate army early in 1861, became colonel of the 3d Georgia regiment of infantry, 8 May, 1861, colonel of the 38th Georgia infantry, 15 Oct., 1861, brigadier-general, 3 June, 1862, and major-general, 26 Nov., 1864. After the close of the war he was editor of the "Chronicle and Sentinel" newspaper. He was elected in 1872 a representative in congress as a Democrat, but died before taking his seat.

WRIGHT, Arthur Williams, physicist, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 8 Sept., 1836. He was graduated at Yale in 1859, and received the degree of Ph. D. there in 1861. Subsequently he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1866, but did not practise. In 1863-'8 he was a tutor at Yale, and in 1868-'9 he studied physical science in Heidelberg and Berlin. In 1869 he became professor of physics and chemistry in Williams, but he returned to Yale in 1872 as professor of molecular physics and chemistry. The title of his chair was changed in 1887 to that of experimental physics. Since 1885 he has had charge of the Sloane physical laboratory at Yale, which was constructed under his supervision. Prof. Wright was the first to observe and describe the electric shadow in 1870-'1, devised a new apparatus for the production of ozone, and investigated its action upon alcohol and ether in 1872-'4; also in 1874 determined the polarization of the zodiacal light, measuring its amount, and investigated its spectrum. He was the first to discover gases in stony meteorites, to extract them and determine their composition, obtaining their spectra in vacuum tubes, and pointing out their relation to the spectra of comets as affording a probable explanation of the latter. In 1877 he devised a method of applying the discharge of electricity in a vacuum to deposit the metal of the electrode upon glass or other surfaces, so as to form brilliant transparent metallic films. He was a member of the party that was stationed at La Junta, Col., to observe the total solar eclipse of 1878, when he determined the character and degree of polarization of the light of the corona with a special form of polarimeter. The same instrument was employed in the detection and measurement of the polarization of the light of several comets and of the moon in 1881-'3. He has devised a novel standard barometer and a simple apparatus for distilling mercury in vacuo, which has been adopted by the U. S. signal service. In 1881-'6 he was consulting specialist to the U. S. signal service bureau. Prof. Wright was chosen in 1879 a fellow of the Royal astronomical society, and in 1881 a member of the National academy of science. He was one of the collaborators in the revisions of Webster's "Dictionary" in 1862-'4 and in 1885-'8. He is the author of many scientific papers.

WRIGHT, Asher, missionary, b. in Hanover, N. H., 7 Sept., 1803; d. in Cattaraugus, N. Y., 13 April, 1875. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1828 and at Andover theological seminary in 1831, and from that year until his death was a missionary to the Seneca Indians upon the Buffalo creek and Cattaraugus reservations. He acquired the Seneca dialect, into which he translated parts of the New Testament, which were printed by the mission press. He also prepared several elementary school-books and a hymnal in that language, and for a time issued a small periodical. He was an accomplished scholar, possessed a good knowledge of medicine, and did much for the improvement of the Senecas. He published "The Interesting Narrative of Mary Jenison, who lived nearly Seventy-eight Years among the Indians" (Buffalo, 1834).—His wife, LAURA SHELTON, b. in Massachusetts about 1808, wrote and translated several hymns in the Seneca dialect.

WRIGHT, Benjamin, engineer, b. in Wethersfield, Conn., 10 Oct., 1770; d. in New York city, 24 Aug., 1842. He studied mathematics by himself, and in 1786 went to Plymouth, Conn., where he studied surveying with his uncle. In 1788 he settled in Fort Stanwix (now Rome), N. Y., where he was actively employed in laying out the property of the new settlers. Having acquired in this manner an accurate knowledge of civil engineering, he was called on to make a map and profile of Wood creek for the Western inland lock navigation company. Subsequently he made a survey of Mohawk river from Fort Stanwix to Schenectady, and proposed a plan for its improvement. During 1811-'12 he made a survey for the canal commissioners, making a complete report of his work. He was repeatedly elected to the legislature, and during the war with Great Britain was appointed county judge. In 1816 he was appointed engineer of the middle section of the Erie canal, and to him, with James Geddes, is chiefly due the credit of the successful completion of the enterprise. Mr. Wright was chief engineer of the Delaware canal, the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, the Harlem railroad, and the St. Lawrence ship canal. In 1834 he was street commissioner of New York city, and in 1834-'6 he conducted a survey for the route of the New York and Erie railroad. Subsequently he was engaged in Virginia.

WRIGHT, Benjamin, soldier, b. in Savannah, Ga., 2 April, 1784; d. in Purdy, Tenn., 30 Jan., 1860. His father, John, a cousin of Sir James Wright, noticed below, was a captain in the Georgia line in the Revolutionary war. Benjamin was appointed a lieutenant in the army by President Madison, 29 July, 1813, and assigned to the 39th regiment of infantry, which was commanded by Col. John Williams. At the battle of the Horse Shoe, 27 March, 1814, as the regiment was moving on the Indian breastworks, Maj. Lemuel Montgomery was killed. Lieut. Wright at once rushed in front of his company, and, sword in hand, mounted the works and called to his men to follow. They passed over the works, and the result of the battle, which ended the Creek war, was the death, disabling, or capture of the entire Indian force. Wright was complimented in general orders and promoted captain in September, 1814. He resigned from the army in June, 1815, and settled in the Choctaw country of western Tennessee, where he built on the present site of Purdy the first log-cabin. He was popular with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and was instrumental in making the treaty by which they ceded their lands in northern Mississippi and western Tennessee. He volunteered at the age of sixty-five in the Mexican war, where he contracted disease that led to his death.—His son, John Vines, lawyer, b. in Purdy, McNairy co., Tenn., 28 June, 1828, received a classical education, studied law, practised in his native town, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving in 1855-'61. He was then chosen colonel of the 13th Tennessee infantry in the Confederate army, and participated in the battle of Belmont. Col. Wright was elected to the first Confederate congress, and re-elected. He has been judge of the circuit court, special chancellor and judge of the state supreme court, and in 1880 was the nominee of the Democratic party for governor of Tennessee, advocating the payment of the state debt, but was defeated on account of disaffected Democrats who were opposed to the payment. He was in 1887 chairman of the northwestern Indian commission, which concluded treaties with 13 tribes, and he is now (1889) a member of the Sioux commission.—Another son, Marcus Joseph, soldier, b. in Purdy, McNairy co., Tenn., 5 June, 1831, received a classical education, in 1857 was appointed assistant purser of the navy-yard at Memphis, afterward studied law, and practised in that city. He entered the Confederate army as lieutenant-colonel of the 154th Tennessee militia regiment, 4 April, 1861, and, with four companies of his regiment and a battery of artillery, occupied and fortified Randolph, Tipton co., on Mississippi river. He was military governor of Columbus, Ky., from February till March, 1862, and lieutenant-colonel and assistant adjutant-general on Gen. Benjamin F. Cheatham's staff during the Kentucky campaign from June till September, 1862. He was appointed brigadier-general, 13 Dec., 1862, and in 1863-'4 was in charge of the district of Atlanta, Ga., until its evacuation. He subsequently commanded the districts of Macon, northern Mississippi, and western Tennessee. He led his regiment in the battles of Belmont and Shiloh, and as brigadier-general he was at Chickamauga. In 1867 he was elected sheriff of Shelby county, Tenn., and on 1 July, 1878, he was appointed agent of the war department to collect Confederate records for publication in the "Official Records of the War of the Rebellion," which place he now holds. He has published "Reminiscences of the Early Settlement and Early Settlers of McNairy County, Tenn." (Washington, 1882), and a "Life of Governor William Blount" (1884).

WRIGHT, Benjamin Hall, engineer, b. in Rome, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1801; d. there, 13 May, 1881. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1822, and served as 2d lieutenant in the 2d infantry on garrison duty in Sackett's Harbor until his resignation on 1 June, 1823. The profession of civil engineering then engaged his attention, and he prompted the first establishment of railroads on the island of Cuba. In 1834 he conducted the preliminary survey and subsequent construction of the line from Havana to Guines, the first railroad in Cuba. He was in 1836 engineer of the Cardenas and Bemba railroad, and in 1837-'42 engineer of the Nuevitas and Puerto Principe railroad. For a time he was associate principal engineer of Cuba, in the service of the Spanish government. He then returned to this country, and was one of the first to conceive the idea of introducing steam as a motive power for canal-boats, building several experimental engines, which were operated successfully.

WRIGHT, Carroll Davidson, statistician, b. in Dunbarton, N. H., 25 July, 1840. He was educated in New Hampshire and Vermont, and began the study of law. At the beginning of the civil war he enlisted in the 14th New Hampshire regiment, of which he became colonel in December, 1864. After serving as acting assistant adjutant-general under Gen. Philip H. Sheridan, he resigned in March, 1865, and was admitted to the New Hampshire bar in October. His health led to his removal to Massachusetts, where he was in the state senate in 1871-'2, during which time he secured the passage of a bill to provide for the establishment of workingmen's trains to Boston from the suburban districts. He was chief of the state bureau of statistics of labor in 1873-'88, and in 1880 was appointed supervisor of the U. S. census in Massachusetts, being also special agent of the census on the factory system. In 1885 he was commissioned by the governor to investigate the public records of the towns, parishes, counties, and courts of that state, and in January, 1885, he was made first commissioner of the bureau of labor in the interior department in Washington, which office had been created in June, 1884. Col. Wright was a Republican presidential elector in 1876. In 1875 and again in 1885 he had charge of the decennial census of Massachusetts. He was lecturer during 1879 on phases of the labor question, ethically considered, at the Lowell institute in Boston, Mass., and during 1881 university lecturer on the factory system at Harvard. He is a member of various scientific societies and has been recording secretary of the American statistical association and president of the American social science association. The degree of A. M. was given him by Tufts college in 1883. Col. Wright has published "Annual Reports of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics of Labor" (15 vols., Boston, 1873-'88); "Census of Massachusetts" (3 vols., 1876-'7); "The Statistics of Boston" (1882); "The Factory System of the United States" (Washington 1882); "The Census of Massachusetts" (4 vols., Boston, 1887-'8); "Reports of U. S. Commissioner of Labor," including "Industrial Depressions" (Washington, 1886); "Convict Labor" (1886); and "Strikes and Lockouts" (1887); also numerous pamphlets, including "The Relation of Political Economy to the Labor Question" (Boston, 1882); "The Factory System as an Element in Civilization" (1882); "Scientific Basis of Tariff Legislation" (1884); "The Present Actual Condition of the Workingman" (1887); "The Study of Statistics in Colleges" (1887); "Problems of the Census" (1887); "Hand Labor in Prisons" (1887); "Historical Sketch of the Knights of Labor" (1887); and "The Growth and Purposes of Bureaus of Statistics of Labor" (1888).

WRIGHT, Charles Barstow, financier, b. in Bradford county, Pa., 8 Jan., 1822. He embarked in business at fifteen, and at nineteen was taken as a partner by his employer. In 1843 he received from the Towanda bank a trust of landed interests in the then small town of Chicago, and in two years he not only fulfilled this mission successfully, but realized handsome profits in Chicago real estate for himself. In 1863 he engaged actively in developing the petroleum interests of Pennsylvania. In 1870, as director and afterward as president, he undertook the work of pushing the Northern Pacific railroad to completion. After the road had been built to Missouri river, and eastward from the Pacific about 100 miles, Jay Cooke and Co., the fiscal agents, failed, during the panic of 1873 that took place, and the completed parts were not paying expenses. Mr. Wright afterward assisted in the reorganization by which the road was completed to Puget sound. In 1873 he took an active part in founding the city of Tacoma, which now has a population of 15,000. He endowed the Annie Wright seminary for girls, and Washington college for boys, at Tacoma, and has been noted for his generosity to young men.

WRIGHT, Chauncey, mathematician, b. in Northampton, Mass., 20 Sept., 1830; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 12 Sept., 1875. He was graduated at Harvard in 1852, and at once became a computer for the recently established "American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac" in Cambridge. His occasional contributions to the "Mathematical Monthly" and similar journals soon gained for him reputation as a mathematician and physicist. Gradually his attention became fixed upon the questions in metaphysics and philosophy that are presented in their latest form in the works of John Stuart Mill, Charles Darwin, Alexander Bain, Herbert Spencer, and others, and he prepared a series of philosophical essays for the "North American Review," which continued until within a few months before his death. These are regarded by Charles Eliot Norton as "the most important contribution made in America to the discussion and investigation of the questions which now chiefly engage the attention of the students of philosophy." In 1870 he delivered a course of university lectures at Harvard on the principles of psychology, and in 1874-'5 he was instructor there in mathematical physics. He was appointed recording secretary of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1863, and held that office for seven years. His writings were collected by Charles Eliot Norton and published, with a biographical sketch, as "Philosophical Discussions" (New York, 1877).

WRIGHT, Elizur, reformer, b. in South Canaan, Conn., 12 Feb., 1804; d. in Medford, Mass., 21 Nov., 1885. His father, Elizur (1762-1845), was graduated at Yale in 1781, and became known for his mathematical learning and devotion to the Presbyterian faith. In 1810 the family removed to Tallmadge, Ohio, and the son worked on the farm and attended an academy that was conducted by his father. His home was often the refuge for fugitive slaves, and he early acquired anti-slavery opinions. He was graduated at Yale in 1826, and taught in Groton, Mass. In 1829-'33 he was professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Western Reserve college, Hudson, Ohio. Mr. Wright attended the convention in Philadelphia in December, 1833, that formed the American anti-slavery society, of which he was chosen secretary, and, removing to New York, he took part in editing the "Emancipator." He conducted the paper called "Human Rights" in 1834-'5, and the "Quarterly Anti-Slavery Magazine" in 1835-'8, and through his continued opposition to slavery incurred the enmity of its advocates. His house was once besieged by a mob, and an attempt was made to kidnap him and convey him to North Carolina. He removed to Boston in 1839, and became editor of the "Massachusetts Abolitionist." For several years he was connected with the press, and in 1846 he established the "Chronotype," a daily newspaper which he conducted until it was merged in the "Commonwealth" (1850), of which he was for a time the editor. Mr. Wright was twice indicted and tried for libel, in consequence of his severe strictures on the liquor interests while publishing the "Chronotype," and again in 1851 for aiding the rescue in Boston of Shadrach, a runaway slave. Between 1853 and 1858, besides editing the "Railroad Times," he gave his attention to invention and mechanics, constructing a spike-making machine, a water-faucet, and an improvement in pipe-coupling. He patented the last two, and manufactured them for a short time. In 1853 he published "Life Insurance Valuation Tables" (2d ed., revised and enlarged, 1871), and in 1858 he secured an act of the Massachusetts legislature to organize an insurance commission, on a basis that required the annual valuation of the policy liabilities of all life-insurance companies in the state. He was appointed insurance commissioner of Massachusetts under this act, which office he held until 1866. He obtained the passage of the Massachusetts non-forfeiture act of 1861, and also its substitute in 1880, which was embodied with some change in the insurance codification bill of 1887. He devised a new formula for finding the values of policies of various terms, now known as the "accumulation formula," and, in order to facilitate his work, invented and afterward patented (1869) the arithmetron, a mechanical contrivance for multiplication and division, based on the logarithmic principle. Afterward he became consulting actuary for life-insurance companies. He was a delegate to the convention of 1840, which formed the Liberty party and nominated James G. Birney for the presidency, and edited "The Free American" in 1841. He was a promoter of the convention at Philadelphia on 4 July, 1876, which organized the National liberal league to support state secularization, and was the second president of the league, being twice re-elected. He was a member of the Forestry association, was instrumental in obtaining the Massachusetts forestry act of 1882, and labored for a permanent forest preserve. He wrote an introduction to Whittier's "Ballads, and other Poems" (London, 1844); and published a translation in verse of La Fontaine's "Fables" (2 vols., Boston, 1841; 2d ed., New York, 1859); "Savings Bank Life Insurance, with Illustrative Tables" (1872); "The Politics and Mysteries of Life Insurance" (1873); and "Myron Holley, and what he did for Liberty and True Religion," a contribution to anti-slavery records (1882).

WRIGHT, Fanny, reformer, b. in Dundee, Scotland, 6 Sept., 1795; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 14 Dec., 1852. Her father was an intimate friend of Adam Smith, Dr. William Cullen, and other scientific and literary men. She became an orphan at an early age, was brought up as a ward in chancery by a maternal aunt, and early adopted the philosophy of the French materialists. She travelled in this country in 1818-'20, and was introduced by Joseph Rodman Drake in the first of the "Croaker" papers. On her return to England she published her "Views of Society and Manners in America" (London, 1821; Paris, 1822). On the invitation of Lafayette she went to Paris, and in 1825 she returned to this country. She purchased 2,400 acres in Tennessee, at Neshoba (now Memphis), and established there a colony of emancipated slaves, whose social condition she sought to elevate. Neshoba, which was held in trust for her by Gen. Lafayette, was restored by him when he discovered that her plans could not be carried out without conflicting with the laws of the state. The negroes in the colony were afterward sent to Hayti. In 1833-'6 she appeared as a public lecturer in the eastern states, where her attacks upon slavery and other social institutions attracted large audiences and led to the establishment of "Fanny Wright societies," but her freedom of speech caused great opposition and the hostility of the press and the church. Fitz-Greene Halleck said her chief theme was "just knowledge," which she pronounced "joost nolidge." She then became associated with Robert Dale Owen in New Harmony, Ind., edited there "The Gazette," and lectured in behalf of his colony, but with little success. In 1838 she visited France, and married there M. D'Arusmont, whose system of philosophy resembled her own, but she was soon separated from him, resumed her own name, and resided with her daughter in Cincinnati, Ohio, until her death. Her last years were spent in retirement. She was benevolent, unselfish, eccentric, and fearless. She published in London in 1817 "Altdorf," a tragedy, founded on the tradition of William Tell and unsuccessfully played at the Park theatre; "A few Days in Athens, being a Translation of a Greek Manuscript discovered in Herculaneum" (London, 1822); and a "Course of Popular Lectures on Free Inquiry, Religion, Morals, Opinions, etc., delivered in the United States" (New York, 1829; 6th ed., 1836). See "Biography, Notes, and Political Letters of Fanny Wright D'Arusmont," published by John Windt (London, 1844), and "Memoir of Fanny Wright, the Pioneer Woman in the Cause of Women's Rights," by Amos Gilbert (Cincinnati, 1855).

WRIGHT, George, soldier, b. in Vermont in 1803; d. at sea, 30 July, 1865. He was educated at common schools and at the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated and promoted 2d lieutenant in the 3d U. S. infantry, 1 July, 1822. He served at Fort Howard, Wis., and Jefferson barracks, Mo., until 1828, was promoted 1st lieutenant, 23 Sept., 1827, and remained in garrison at Fort Leavenworth till 1831, when he became adjutant of his regiment. On 30 Oct., 1836, he was promoted captain, and in 1838 he was transferred to the 8th infantry upon the organization of that regiment, serving during the Canada border troubles and at Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., till 1840. He took part in the Florida war against the Seminoles, remaining in that country with the 8th infantry until 1844, and receiving the brevet of major "for meritorious conduct in zeal, energy, and perseverance." Maj. Wright took an active part in the war with Mexico, in the principal engagements from Vera Cruz to Molino del Rey, where he commanded the storming party and was wounded. For his services in Mexico he was brevetted to the grade of colonel. In 1848 he became major, in 1855 lieutenant-colonel of the 4th infantry, and on 3 March, 1855, colonel of the 9th infantry, having served during that period in California and Washington territory. He was in command of the northern district of the Department of the Pacific till 1857, and during this time conducted operations against the Indians, especially at the Cascades in 1856 and in Oregon. In 1858 he commanded an expedition against the Spokanes, with whom he had several combats. At the opening of the civil war he commanded the Department of Oregon, from which he was transferred to command the Department of the Pacific with the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers, 28 Sept., 1861. He served there until 1864, and was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, 19 Dec., 1864, "for long, faithful, and meritorious services." Gen. Wright was drowned, 30 July, 1865, on the wreck of the "Brother Jonathan" while on his way to assume command of the Department of the Columbia.

WRIGHT, George Frederick, geologist, b. in Whitehall, N. Y., 22 Jan., 1838. He was graduated at Oberlin in 1859, and at the theological seminary there in 1862, and during 1860 he was for five months a private in the 7th Ohio volunteers. In 1862 he entered on the pastorate of the Congregational church in Bakersfield, Vt., where he was ordained in September, 1863, and in 1872 was called to a similar charge in Andover, Mass. He accepted the professorship of New Testament language and literature in 1881, which chair he still holds. Prof. Wright has devoted considerable attention to geology. In 1881 he was assistant geologist on the Pennsylvania survey, and since 1884 he has been connected with the division of glacial geology on the U. S. survey. He is a member of scientific societies, and in 1884 became an associate editor of the "Bibliotheca Sacra." His works include "The Logic of Christian Evidence" (Andover, 1880); "Studies in Science and Religion" (1882); "The Relation of Death to Probation" (Boston, 1882); "The Glacial Boundary in Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky" (Cleveland, 1884); and "The Divine Authority of the Bible" (Boston, 1884).

WRIGHT, Hendrick Bradley, lawyer, b. in Plymouth, Luzerne co., Pa., 24 April, 1808; d. in Wilkesbarre, Pa., 2 Sept., 1881. He was educated at Dickinson college, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1831, and began practice in Wilkesbarre. He was appointed district attorney for Luzerne county in 1834, and was elected to the legislature in 1841-'3, serving in the latter year as speaker. He was a member of all the national Democratic conventions between 1840 and 1860, and was the presiding officer in the one that nominated James K. Polk for president. Being elected to congress as a Democrat, he served from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1855. He was elected again to fill the vacancy caused by the death of George W. Scranton, serving from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1863, and again from 1877 till 1881. He published "A Practical Treatise on Labor" (New York, 1871), and "Historical Sketches of Plymouth, Luzerne Co., Pa." (Philadelphia, 1873).—His nephew, Harrison, lawyer, b. in Wilkesbarre, Pa., 15 July, 1850; d. there, 20 Feb., 1885, was educated in his native city and at Heidelberg, Germany, where he studied four years, receiving in 1871 the degrees of A. M. and Ph. D. He returned home, studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1874. He was chosen secretary of the Wyoming historical and geological society of Wilkesbarre in 1874, and devoted himself to literary and scientific pursuits. Mr. Wright was a member of the Archæological society of Rome, and other societies. He published various monographs on archæological and scientific subjects. His last publications—"The Manuscripts of the Earl of Ashburnham, a Translation of the Report to the Minister of Public Instruction and Fine Arts, by Leopold Delisle, of the National Library" (1884), and "Observations on the Very Ancient Manuscript of the Libri Collection, by Leopold Delisle" (1884), which he published and circulated widely in America—were doubtless the means of preventing the sale of these treasures in this country and of restoring them to the National library at Paris. He also edited the first volume of the "Proceedings" of the Wyoming historical and geological society.

WRIGHT, Henry Clarke, reformer, b. in Sharon, Litchfield co., Conn., 29 Aug., 1797; d. in Pawtucket, R. I., 16 Aug., 1870. For many years he was a noted lecturer on anti-slavery topics, and was an advocate of peace, socialism, and spiritualism, on all of which subjects his convictions were vehement, and were delivered with eloquence. At one time he was conspicuous among the band of anti-slavery orators that assembled annually in New York at the anniversary of the American anti-slavery society, and by its earnestness enlisted the sympathy of the people. He was the author of "Man-Killing by Individuals and Nations Wrong" (Boston, 1841); "A Kiss for a Blow" (London, 1843; new ed., 1866); "Defensive War proved to be a Denial of Christianity" (1846); "Human Life Illustrated" (Boston, 1849); "Marriage and Parentage" (1854); and "The Living Present and the Dead Past" (1865).

WRIGHT, Horatio Gouverneur, soldier, b. in Clinton, Conn., 6 March, 1820. He was graduated second in his class at the U. S. military academy in 1841, served in the engineer corps, and in 1842-'4 as assistant professor, first of French and then of engineering, at West Point, and was promoted 1st lieutenant in 1848. After superintending the building of forts and improvements in Florida he became captain in 1855, and till the civil war was assistant to the chief engineer at Washington, also serving on several special ordnance boards. He declined a major's commission in the 13th infantry on 14 May, 1861, but, after constructing several of the defences of Washington, taking part in the battle of Bull Run as chief engineer of Heintzelman's division, and organizing the Port Royal expedition in the same capacity, he accepted that rank in the engineer corps in August, and on 14 Sept. became brigadier-general of volunteers. He took part in the capture of Hilton Head, S. C., in November, led the land forces in the Florida expedition, February-June, 1862, and on 18 July, 1862, became major-general of volunteers. He commanded the Department of the Ohio till 26 March, 1863, the District of Louisville, Ky., till April, and then led a division of the Army of the Potomac in the Pennsylvania and Rapidan campaigns, receiving the brevet of lieutenant-colonel for the capture of Rappahannock Station, where he temporarily commanded the 6th corps. After the death of Gen. John Sedgwick, 9 May, 1864, he succeeded to the command of that corps, and on 12 May was brevetted colonel for gallantry at Spottsylvania. While at Petersburg he was ordered to the defence of Washington during Gen. Jubal A. Early's invasion of Maryland, in the midsummer of 1864. Great anxiety was felt lest succor from the troops in front of Petersburg should not arrive in time to save the capital, but as Early's advance arrived in the suburbs of Washington on the north, Wright's troops were landing at the wharves on the south. With some regiments of the 19th corps just arrived from the Gulf and a few other hastily gathered troops, Gen. Wright was ready to meet any assault. Early was soon forced to withdraw in the face of a strong reconnaissance which Gen. Wright pushed out. "I have sent from here," wrote Gen. Grant to President Lincoln from the Petersburg lines, "a whole corps, commanded by an excellent officer." And to a prominent official of the war department he said: "Boldness is all that is needed to drive the enemy out of Maryland, and Wright is the man to assume that." Gen. Wright rallied the troops under his command, re-formed the line, and did much to retrieve the fortunes of the early surprise at Cedar Creek, 19 Oct., 1864. His 6th corps first broke the strong lines at Petersburg on Sunday morning, 2 April, 1865. In his official report of that battle Gen. Grant said: "Gen. Wright penetrated the line with his whole corps, sweeping everything before him, and to his left toward Hatcher's Run, capturing many guns and several thousand prisoners." He was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1865, for gallantry in the battle of Cold Harbor, and major-general for the capture of Petersburg, Va. On 14 June, 1865 he received the thanks of the Connecticut legislature. He was made lieutenant-colonel, 23 Nov., 1865, and then served on various engineering boards, becoming colonel, 4 March, 1879, and chief-of-engineers with the rank of brigadier-general, 30 June, 1879. On 22 March, 1884, he was retired from active service. Gen. Wright is co-author of a "Report on the Fabrication of Iron for Defences" (Washington, 1871).

H. G. Wright

WRIGHT, Sir James, bart., governor of Georgia, b. in Charleston, S. C., about 1714; d. in London, England, 20 Nov., 1785. His father, Robert, removed from Durham, England, to Charleston, and was chief justice of South Carolina for many years. The son was probably educated in England, studied law, and practised in Charleston. He was appointed agent of the province in Great Britain, and became chief justice and lieutenant-governor of South Carolina on 13 May, 1760. He was appointed royal governor of Georgia in 1764, and was the last to administer its affairs in the name of the king. He arrived in Savannah in October, 1764, and his management of affairs was successful until the passage of the stamp-act. He labored to convince the people that they should submit to the king's authority, but the governor's proclamations only served to exasperate them. On 5 Dec., 1766, his majesty's ship "Speedwell" arrived in the Savannah river with the stamped paper, which was placed under the care of the commissary; but, on receiving news that the "Liberty boys" had determined to break open the fort and destroy the papers, the governor ordered a guard to prevent their seizure, and afterward had them removed to Fort George, on Cockspur island. In 1768 the governor charged the assembly with revolutionary conduct and dismissed it. On 17 June, 1775, several men-of-war arrived in Tybee, and, to prevent the governor from holding communication with them, Joseph Habersham entered his dwelling and took him prisoner; but the governor made his escape, and went to Bonaventure, whence he was conveyed to the armed ship "Scarborough," where he addressed a letter to his council. The assembly adjourned without giving Gov. Wright an answer, and he then planned an attack upon the town, which proved unsuccessful, and he afterward sailed for England. In 1779 he was despatched to resume the government of Georgia. Savannah was at this time in possession of the British, and the Americans were endeavoring to recover it. The friends of Gen. Wright say that, owing to his determination and spirit, the defence of his capital "was one of the most brilliant events of the war in the south," and would not have been made but for his deciding vote in the council of war. At the close of hostilities he retired to England, and his extensive property was confiscated. He was created a baronet on 8 Dec., 1772. Wrightsborough, Columbia co., Ga., was named in his honor.—His brother, Jermyn, was in command of a fort on St. Mary's river, which became a rendezvous for the Tories of that part of the country, and was unsuccessfully assailed by the patriots. A severe writer calls it a "nest of villains." Another account is that Wright's force consisted of negroes. In 1778 he was attainted, and lost his estate. His name appears in the confiscation act of South Carolina in 1782.—James's son, James, succeeded his father in 1785. The Georgia Royalists were raised for him in 1779, but his name is found in connection with that corps only at the siege of Savannah, when his post was in a redoubt built of green wood strengthened by fillings of sand, and mounted with heavy cannon. He died in 1816 without issue, and his title reverted to his grand-nephew, Sir James Alexander.—Another son, Alexander, b. in 1751, married Elizabeth, the only daughter and heiress of John Izard, of South Carolina. At the close of the Revolution he settled in Jamaica, W. I. He was of "known and just influence."

WRIGHT, Joel Tombleson, Canadian clergyman, b. in Upwell, Isle of Ely, England, 16 March, 1834. He removed to Canada in 1855, and was ordained as a priest of the Church of England in Canada in 1862 by Bishop Benjamin Cronyn. He was incumbent of Wardsville and adjacent places in Middlesex county for eight years, and has since been rector of St. James's church, St. Mary's, Ont. He was plaintiff in the celebrated chancery suit, Wright vs. the Synod of Huron, instituted in 1881 on behalf of himself and other clergy of the diocese. The case finally reached the supreme court of Canada, which decided against Mr. Wright, who thereupon, in 1884, appealed to the privy council of Great Britain, where it is now pending. He is known as a lecturer on Freemasonry, and has published a work on "Constitutional Government and Synod Legislation" (1879).

WRIGHT, John C., jurist, b. in Wethersfield, Conn., in 1783; d. in Washington, D. C., 13 Feb., 1861. He received an academic education, learned the trade of a printer, and went to Troy, N. Y., where he edited "The Gazette" for several years. After studying law he was admitted to the bar and began practice in Steubenville, Ohio. For many years he was judge of the state supreme court, and he was elected to congress as an Adams Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1823, till 3 March, 1829, and being afterward defeated for re-election as a Henry Clay Democrat. He and Tristram Burgess, of Rhode Island, were the only two members of the house that ventured to reply to John Randolph of Roanoke in the style of sarcasm that characterized Randolph's speeches. He was a delegate to the peace congress in Washington in February, 1861, but died before its adjournment. For several years he was the editor and proprietor of the Cincinnati "Gazette." His speeches in congress on the "resolution calling on the secretary of state for information relative to the selection of newspapers for the publication of the laws" were issued (Washington, 1827). He also published "Supreme Court Reports of Ohio" (Columbus, 1831-'4). This book possessed much legal authority at the time of its publication, and is still held in repute. Many of the cases are reported in a vein of peculiar facetiousness, for which Judge Wright was noted.—His son, Crafts James, soldier, b. in Troy, N. Y., 13 July, 1808; d. in Chicago, Ill., 23 July, 1883, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1828, but resigned on 8 Nov., 1828, studied law, was admitted to the bar of Ohio, and practised with his father. In 1840 he became assistant editor of the Cincinnati "Gazette," and from 1847 till 1854 he was president of the "Gazette" company, after which he again practised law. He aided in organizing the first telegraph company in the west and became one of its directors. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the National army as colonel of the 8th Missouri infantry, but afterward he raised and disciplined the 13th Missouri. He served in the Tennessee campaign of 1862, and for his services received the thanks of the governor of Missouri. In March, 1862, he was in command of Clarksville. He was afterward ordered to Pittsburg Landing, where he was senior colonel, and given command of a brigade. He was also engaged in the Mississippi campaign and in the siege of Corinth, where he remained ill for many weeks until he resigned his commission on 16 Sept., 1862. For his services at Shiloh, President Lincoln nominated him for the post of brigadier-general, but he resigned before he could be confirmed by the senate. Subsequently he engaged in farming in Glendale, Ohio, but afterward lived in Chicago, where in 1876 he was made steward of the marine hospital.—His wife, MARGARET, was active during the war in visiting hospitals and battlefields, and was identified with many benevolent works. She was at one time the only woman on the boat that carried disabled soldiers to the north, and acted as nurse to them under the direction of the senior surgeon.

WRIGHT, John Stephen, manufacturer, b. at Sheffield, Mass., 16 July, 1815; d. in Chicago, Ill., 26 Sept., 1874. On 29 Oct., 1832, he arrived in Chicago with his father, and they at once established a store. In 1837 he built at his own expense, for $507.93, the first public-school building in Chicago. In 1840 he established the "Prairie Farmer," which is still in existence. In 1845 he wrote for the New York "Commercial Advertiser" numerous articles setting forth the advantages and prospective greatness of Chicago and the northwest. In 1852 he began the manufacture of Atkins's self-raking reaper and mower. He was one of the active promoters of the Illinois Central railroad, and sent thousands of circulars at his own expense from Chicago to the Gulf, calling attention of the people to the prospective benefits of such a road through the state. He published a valuable statistical work entitled "Chicago: Past, Present, and Future" (Chicago, 1870).

WRIGHT, Joseph, portrait-painter, b. in Bordentown, N. J., in 1756; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1793. He was the son of Patience Wright, who excelled in modelling miniature heads in wax. In 1772 he went to England with his parents, and there received his art education. Subsequently he studied in Paris under the care of Benjamin Franklin, and on his return to this country he narrowly escaped with his life from a shipwreck. In the autumn of 1783 he painted a three-quarters-length portrait of George Washington, afterward he painted another for the Count de Solms, and still later he made a miniature profile from life. He was appointed by President Washington first draughtsman and die-sinker in the U. S. mint, and the first coins and medals issued by the National government were his handiwork.

WRIGHT, Joseph Albert, governor of Indiana, b. in Washington, Pa., 17 April, 1810; d. in Berlin, Germany, 11 May, 1867. He removed to Bloomington, Ind., with his parents, and entered the State university, where, to procure his education, he acted as janitor. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1829, began practice in Rockville, Ind., and was a member of both houses of the legislature. Being elected to congress as a Democrat, he served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1845, and from 1849 till 1857 he was governor of Indiana. In the last-named year he was appointed minister to Prussia, holding this position until 1861. From 3 March, 1862, till 22 Jan., 1863, he served in the U. S. senate to fill the unexpired term of Jesse D. Bright, who had been expelled. He was appointed U. S. commissioner to the Hamburg exhibition in 1863, and was then a second time minister to Prussia, serving from 1865 until his death.—His brother, George Grover, jurist, b. in Bloomington, Ind., 24 March, 1820, was graduated at the University of Indiana in 1839, studied law with his brother in Rockville, and removed to Iowa in 1840, where he began practice. He was prosecuting attorney in 1847-'8, was elected to the Iowa senate in 1849, serving two terms, and was chosen chief justice of the supreme court of Iowa in 1854, serving till 1870. From 1868 till 1870 he was a professor in the law department of the University of Iowa, and he was then elected U. S. senator as a Republican, holding his seat from 4 March, 1871, till 3 March, 1877, and serving on the committees on finance, the judiciary, claims, and the civil service. He then resumed his practice, and for the past five years has lectured before the law-school of the State university. He is president of the Polk county savings-bank. In 1860-'5 he was president of the Iowa agricultural society.

WRIGHT, Joseph Jefferson Burr, soldier, b. in Wilkesbarre, Pa., 27 April, 1800; d. in Carlisle, Pa., 14 May, 1878. He was educated at Washington college, Pa., and received his medical degree at Jefferson medical college in 1836. He entered the U. S. army as a volunteer, became assistant surgeon on 25 Oct., 1833, and major and surgeon on 26 March, 1844, and served in the war with Mexico, participating in the principal battles, and being in charge of the general hospitals at Matamoros and Vera Cruz. At the close of the war he transferred the sick and wounded to New Orleans, and, after being at the U. S. military academy, served in Texas and on the frontier until 1861. He was then intrusted with organizing general hospitals in the west and arranging medical affairs on an efficient basis for field service. As medical director on the staff of Gen. George B. McClellan he was present at Rich Mountain and Carrick's Ford, W. Va., and on the transfer of that officer to the east he declined the post of medical director of the Army of the Potomac, and was appointed medical director of the Department of the Missouri on the staff of Gen. Henry W. Halleck, with headquarters in St. Louis, Mo. Owing to his advancing years, he did not participate actively in the war after 1862. He was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865, and retired from service on 31 Dec., 1876. Dr. Wright was among the first to use and recommend the sulphate of quinine, administered in large doses during the remission in the treatment of malarial remittent fevers. This method of treatment is now admitted to be of great value. He contributed to medical literature, and published articles in the "Southern Medical Reports."

WRIGHT, Luther, educator, b. in Easthampton, Mass., 24 Nov., 1796; d. there, 5 Sept., 1870. After graduation at Yale in 1822, he was principal of an academy in Maryland for two years, and then returned to Yale, where he served as a tutor, and studied theology. Subsequently he taught in Middletown and Ellington, Conn., and was principal of the academy in Leicester, Mass., in 1833-'9. He was the first principal of Williston seminary, which he organized (see WILLISTON, SAMUEL), serving from 1841 till 1849, when he resigned, but for several years gave instruction to private pupils. Mr. Wright published an address at the dedication of the academy building in Leicester (1833), and a historical sketch of Easthampton (1851).

WRIGHT, Milton, bishop of the United Brethren in Christ, b. in Rush county, Ind., 17 Nov., 1828. He was graduated at Hartsville college in 1853, and in 1855-'6 was pastor of the Church of the United Brethren in Indianapolis. He was ordained in the latter year, and, after holding a charge at Andersonville, Ind., in 1856-'7, he went as missionary to Oregon, where he was pastor at Sublimity, and president of Sublimity college, a denominational institution, in 1857-'9. From 1859 till 1869 he served in the itinerancy in the White river conference, during which he was presiding elder and pastor in Hartsville, Ind., and also professor of theology in Hartsville college in 1868-'9. In 1877 he became bishop, and until 1881 held that position in the western Mississippi district. In 1881-'5 he was presiding elder in the White river conference, and in the latter year he was re-elected bishop for a term of four years and sent to the Pacific coast district. Westfield college, Ill., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1878. He was editor of the "Religious Telescope," the organ of his church, in 1868-'9, and editor and publisher of "The Richmond Star," Richmond, Ind., in 1883-'5, and has published several tracts.

WRIGHT, Rebecca McPherson, spy, b. near Winchester, Va., 31 Jan., 1838. She was a Quaker, and her father, Amos Wright, died in a Confederate prison early in the civil war. Her family was one of the few of Union sentiment that remained in Winchester, Va., during that period. On 16 Sept., 1864, she received a note from Gen. Philip H. Sheridan, which was conveyed to her wrapped in a small wad of tin-foil, and carried in the mouth of a negro messenger. It read thus: "Can you inform me of the position of Early's forces, the number of divisions in his army, and the strength of all or any of them, and his probable or reported intentions? Have any more troops arrived from Richmond, or are any more coming, or reported to be coming?" Having been told of the position of the Confederate army by a wounded Confederate officer, who visited her two evenings previously, she sent a reply to Gen. Sheridan, describing the number of troops and their situation, and upon her information he directed the attack on Winchester. After the battle she was thanked in person by Gen. Sheridan, who always spoke of her as his "little Quaker girl," and in 1867 sent her a gold watch as a memento. In 1871 she married William C. Bonsal, and she has held a clerkship in the United States treasury department at Washington since 1868.

WRIGHT, Robert, governor of Maryland, b. in Kent county, Md., about 1765; d. in Queenstown, Md., 7 Sept., 1826. After receiving a public-school education he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Queenstown. Being elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, he served from 7 Dec., 1801, till 1806, when he resigned. From 1806 till 1809 he was governor of the state. After being in congress from 3 Dec., 1810, till 3 March, 1817, and again from 3 Dec., 1821, till 3 March, 1823, he was appointed district judge of Kent county.

WRIGHT, Robert Emmet, lawyer, b. in Allentown, Pa., in 1810. He was educated at Allentown academy, studied law and was admitted to the bar, and has practised in his native town. He is the author of many essays on constitutional reform, and has published practical digests of the laws of Pennsylvania on "Aldermen and Justices of the Peace" (Philadelphia, 1839); "The Office and Duties of Constable" (1840); the "Reported Cases determined in the Several Courts of Pennsylvania from May Term, 1836, till December, 1841" (1842); and "Pennsylvania State Reports" (14 vols., 1861-'6). He has edited William Graydon's "Forms of Conveyancing" (1845); Samuel Roberts's "Digest of Select British Statutes" (1847); and F. Carroll Brewster's "Reports at Law and in Equity" (1847).

WRIGHT, Robert William, author, b. in Ludlow, Vt., 22 Feb., 1816; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 9 Jan., 1885. His grandfather, Stephen, was the fourth in descent from Capt. Edward Wright, of Concord, Mass., who came to this country from Bromwick, England, in 1645. After graduation at Harvard in 1842, he taught in the public grammar-schools in Boston, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1845. He then went to Wisconsin and practised his profession in Waukesha until 1856, and in 1852 declined the Whig nomination for congress from that district. In 1856-'9 he resided in Waterbury, Conn., where he practised law, edited the Waterbury "Journal," and served one year as judge of probate. He edited the Hartford "Daily Post" in 1858, the New Haven "Daily News" from 1859, and afterward the Richmond, Va., "State Journal." Afterward he removed to Cheshire, Conn., which was his home until his death. He invented two successful newspaper addressers, for which he obtained patents, and devoted his leisure to astronomy and literature. He read papers before the New Haven colony historical society, contributed to magazines, and printed numerous satirical poems. He published "The Church Knaviad, or Horace in West Haven, by Horatius Flaccus," a satirical mock-heroic poem (New Haven, 1864); "The Vision of Judgment, or the South Church, Ecclesiastical Councils viewed from Celestial and Satanic Standpoints by Quevedo Redivivus" (1867); "The Pious Chi-Neh, or a Veritable History of the Great Election Fraud, done into Verse by U Bet," a humorous pasquinade on the election of 1871 in Connecticut (1872); and "Life: its True Genesis," a refutation of the Darwinian theory (New York, 1880). Mr. Wright was also the author of "Practical Legal Forms" (Milwaukee, 1852).

WRIGHT, Rufus, artist, b. in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1832. He was a pupil at the National academy, and studied also for a time under George A. Baker. His professional life has been spent in New York, Washington, and Brooklyn. In 1866 he was made a member of the Brooklyn academy of design. His portraits include those of Roger B. Taney, Edwin M. Stanton, and William H. Seward. About 1875 he turned his attention also to the painting of composition pictures, and has produced, among other works, "The Morning Bouquet" and "The Inventor and the Banker" (1876); "Thank you, Sir!" (1877); "Concerned for his Sole" (1878); and "Feeding the Birds" (1880).

WRIGHT, Silas, statesman, b. in Amherst, Mass., 24 May, 1795; d. in Canton, St. Lawrence co., N. Y., 27 Aug., 1847. His early life was spent on his father's farm in Weybridge, Vt., and after graduation at Middlebury college in 1815 he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in Canton. In 1820 he was appointed surrogate of St. Lawrence county, and in 1823-'7 he was a member of the state senate, where he opposed the political advancement of De Witt Clinton, regarding it as dangerous to the Democratic party, of which he was a firm adherent throughout his life. In 1827 he made a report to the senate developing the financial policy with which he was identified throughout his life, and which he subsequently enforced as a political measure, while he was governor of New York. In 1827 he was made brigadier-general of the state militia. He served in congress from 3 Dec., 1827, till 3 March, 1829, and there voted for the protective tariff of 1828, and for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia. In 1829 he was appointed comptroller of New York, which office he held until 1833, when he was chosen to the U. S. senate in place of William L. Marcy. In that body he served on the committee on finance, supported the force bill and Henry Clay's compromise bill of 1833, introduced the first sub-treasury bill, which became a law, defended President Jackson's removal of the deposits from the U. S. bank, and delivered a speech opposing Daniel Webster's motion to recharter that institution. He also voted against receiving a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and in favor of excluding from the mails all "printed matter calculated to excite the prejudices of the southern states in regard to the question of slavery." Mr. Wright opposed the distribution among the states of the surplus Federal revenues, supported the independent treasury scheme of Van Buren, maintained in reference to the abolition of slavery the right of petition and the sovereignty of congress over the territories in 1838, and voted for the tariff of 1842 and for the annexation of Texas. His term extended from 11 Jan., 1833, till 1 Dec., 1844, when he resigned to become governor of New York, which post he held until 1847, during which period he opposed the calling of a convention to revise the state constitution, vetoed a bill to appropriate money for canal improvements, and took decided ground against the anti-rent rioters, declaring Delaware county in a state of insurrection and calling out a military force. He was defeated as candidate for re-election in 1846. When in April, 1847, the application of the Wilmot proviso to the territories that had been obtained from Mexico was under discussion, Mr. Wright emphatically declared that the arms and the money of the Union ought never to be used for the acquisition of territory for the purpose of planting slavery. In May, 1847, he wrote a letter expressing himself in favor of using the money of the Federal government to improve the harbors of the northern lakes. He refused several offers of cabinet offices and foreign missions. After his term as governor he retired to his farm in Canton, which he cultivated with his own hands. His mind was logical and powerful, and he was considered a clear and practical statesman. Horatio Seymour said: "Mr. Wright was a great man, an honest man; if he committed errors, they were induced by his devotion to his party. He was not selfish; to him his party was everything—himself nothing." There is a good portrait of him by James Whitehouse in the New York city-hall. See "Eulogy on Silas Wright," by Henry D. Gilpin (Philadelphia, 1847); his "Life and Times," by Jabez D. Hammond (Syracuse, 1848); and his "Life," by John S. Jenkins (Utica, 1852).

WRIGHT, Thomas Lee, physician, b. in Windham, Portage co., Ohio, 7 Aug., 1825. He was educated at Miami university and at Ohio medical college, where he was graduated in 1846. Until 1854 he practised in Kansas City, chiefly among the Wyandotte Indians, and he afterward removed to Bellefontaine, Ohio. He lectured on the theory and practice of medicine in Ohio Wesleyan university in 1855-'6, and was a member of the Ohio medical society and president of the Logan county medical society. Dr. Wright has made the scientific aspects of inebriety a special study. This has led to inquiries respecting the effects of alcohol, not only immediately, but remotely, upon the nervous functions and capacities; and finally upon minds and morals in their several departments. In 1887 he attended the International congress of inebriety held in London, and was one of its vice-presidents. He also edited the "Ohio Censor," a political journal published in Bellefontaine. Dr. Wright has contributed to the transactions of the Ohio medical society and medical journals, and has written "Notes on the Theory of Human Existence" (1848) and "Disquisition on the Ancient History of Medicine" (1860). He has published "Inebriism, a Pathological and Psychological Study" (Columbus, 1885).

WRIGHT, William, senator, b. in Clarkstown, Rockland co., N. Y., in 1794; d. in Newark, N. J., 1 Nov., 1866. He was a volunteer for the defence of Stonington, Conn., in the war of 1812. The death of his father, Dr. William Wright, compelled him to abandon the hope of a collegiate education, and he learned the trade of a saddler, and followed this business in Bridgeport, Conn., for seven years. After acquiring a fortune, he removed to Newark, N. J., in 1821, and was mayor of that town in 1840-'3. Being elected to congress as a Henry Clay Whig, he served from 4 Dec., 1843, till

Wm. Wright

3 March, 1847, and in the latter year was a defeated candidate for governor of New Jersey. He was twice elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, and served from 4 March, 1853, till 4 March, 1859, and from 7 Dec., 1863, till his death. He was chairman of the committee on manufactures and of that on the contingent expenses of the senate, and served also on the committees on public lands and Revolutionary claims.

WRIGHT, William, journalist, b. in Ireland in 1824; d. in Paterson, N. J., 13 March, 1866. He came to this country about 1841 and settled near Paterson, N. J., where he engaged in teaching. In 1854 he founded in that town "The Press," a Republican journal. He took an active part in the canvass for the presidency in 1856, advocating the election of John C. Frémont, and chiefly through his exertions Paterson for the first time in its history gave a majority against the Democratic party. In 1858 he was interested in a paper called the "Republican," afterward merged into the "Daily Guardian." In 1860 Mr. Wright removed to New York, where he was connected with the "Evening Post" and the "Commercial Advertiser" and contributed to other journals; but in 1864 he returned to Paterson and engaged in journalism there. Shortly before his death he established the "Monthly Review." He published "The Oil Regions of Pennsylvania, showing where Petroleum is Found, how it is obtained, and at what Cost, with Hints for Whom it may Concern" (New York, 1865).

WRIGHT, William Bull, poet, b. in Orange county, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1840; d. in Atlanta, Ga., 29 March, 1880. After graduation at Princeton in 1859 he taught in Buffalo until 1862, when he entered the 5th New York artillery as a private. While his regiment was stationed at Fort McHenry, Md., he was prostrated by typhoid fever, but after his recovery he rejoined his regiment, and participated in Sheridan's campaign in the Shenandoah valley. He served until the end of the war, part of the time as judge-advocate, and was mustered out as lieutenant with the brevet of major. He was graduated at the New York college of physicians and surgeons, practised medicine in Orange county until 1871, and was professor of ancient languages in the normal school at Buffalo, N. Y., from that year until 1878, when he resigned, owing to impaired health. He was the author of "Highland Rambles, a Poem" (Boston, 1868), and "The Brook, and other Poems" (New York, 1873).

WRIGHT, William Henry, engineer, b. in Wilmington, N. C., in 1814; d. there, 29 Dec., 1845. He was a grandson of Judge Joshua Granger Wright (1768-1811), who served in the legislature from 1792 till 1800, and was speaker in the latter year. After graduation at William and Mary college William studied law, which he abandoned to enter the U. S. military academy. He was graduated there in 1834, promoted 2d lieutenant in the 1st artillery, was transferred to the engineer corps on 1 July, 1838, and became 1st lieutenant on 7 Dec. of that year. He served as assistant engineer in the construction of Fort Warren, Boston harbor, and as superintending engineer on the sea wall for the protection of Lovell's island in that harbor in 1844-'5. Lieut. Wright was the author of a "Brief Practical Treatise on Mortars, with an Account of the Processes at the Public Works in Boston Harbor" (Boston, 1845).

WRIGHT, William Janes, mathematician, b. in Weybridge, Vt., 3 Aug., 1831. He was graduated at Union college in 1857, and studied at Union and Princeton theological seminaries. He was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian church in 1863, was a chaplain in the National army in 1863-'5, and, besides holding various pastorates and spending two years in European study, has been professor of mathematics at Wilson college, Pa., in 1876-'7, and of metaphysics at Westminster college, Mo., since 1887. He received the degree of Ph. D. from Union in 1876, and that of LL. D. from Westminster college in 1882. Dr. Wright has published "Tracts on Higher Mathematics," including treatises on determinants, trilinear co-ordinates, and invariants (London, 1875-'9).—His wife, Julia McNair, author, b. in Oswego, N. Y., 1 May, 1840, was the daughter of John McNair, a well-known civil engineer, whose father emigrated from Scotland in 1798. She was educated at private schools and academies, married Dr. Wright in 1859, and has devoted her life mainly to literary work. Her books are mostly religious stories, anti-Catholic. Many of them have been republished in Europe and several have been translated into Arabic. Her works include "Priest and Nun" (1869); "Jug-or-Not" (New York, 1870); "Saints and Sinners" (Philadelphia, 1873); "The Early Church in Britain" (1874); "Bricks from Babel," a manual of ethnography (1876); "The Complete Home" (1879); "A Wife Hard Won," a novel (1882); and "The Nature Readers" (3 vols., Boston, 1887-'8).

WURTELE, Jonathan Saxton Campbell, Canadian jurist, b. in Quebec, 27 Jan., 1828. He is the son of Jonathan Wurtele, seignior of River David, and was the last Canadian seignior to render homage, 3 Feb., 1854. He was educated at Quebec high-school and privately studied law, and was called to the bar of Lower Canada in 1850. He became professor of commercial law in McGill university in 1869, received the degree of B. C. L. from that institution in 1870, and of D. C. L. in 1882, and is now an emeritus professor. He became queen's counsel in 1873. In 1875 he was elected to the legislature of Quebec, re-elected in 1878 and in 1881, and again in 1882 on his being appointed provincial treasurer. He was speaker of the Quebec assembly in 1884-'6, and in the latter year was appointed judge of the superior court of the province. He was made an officer of public instruction in 1880 and an officer of the Legion of honor in France in 1882. Mr. Wurtele negotiated a loan in France for the province of Quebec in 1880, and organized at the same time the Credit foncier Franco Canadien, of which he is a director. He has been counsel of the German society of Montreal, and has held the offices of chief clerk of the seigniorial commission, mayor of St. David, and president of the school commissioners of that place. He is a Liberal-Conservative in politics, and is the author of a "Manual of the Legislative Assembly of Quebec" (Quebec, 1885).

WURTZ, Henry, chemist, b. in Easton, Pa., 5 June, 1828. He was graduated at Princeton in 1848, and then studied chemistry at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard. In 1851 he became instructor at the Yale (now Sheffield) scientific school, and in 1853-'5 he was chemist to the geological survey of New Jersey. He was chosen professor of chemistry at the Medical college in Kingston, Canada, in 1857, and a year later accepted a similar chair at the National medical college in Washington, D. C., while at the same time he was examiner in the chemical division of the U. S. patent-office until 1861. Prof. Wurtz then removed to New York. His original work has included the discovery of the mineral hisingerite in America (1850); the invention of methods for the production of alum from greensand marl and potassium chloride and potassium sulphate from similar sources (1850); methods of preparing pure alkalies and alkaline earths (1852); applications of sodium amalgams (1865); new modes of manufacture of fuel gas by the alternating action of air and steam on cheap coal (1869); the production of magnesia by precipitation from sea-water by means of calcium hydroxide (1877); the discovery of the minerals animikite and huntelite (1878); a new method of concentrating and caking granular materials of all kinds by mixing with small percentages of metallic iron and a solution of ferrous sulphate (1882); and a new method of distilling coal to obtain liquid products. He was engaged until 1888 in perfecting processes by means of which greater yields of the heavy paraffin oils, paraffin wax, carboic acid, and other products can be obtained from coals of all kinds more quickly, also in developing the generation of electricity by methods the chemical products of which will be of sufficient value to pay all costs. Prof. Wurtz entered the employ of Thomas A. Edison as chemist in October, 1888. In 1876 he served as a judge on the international jury of awards at the World's fair in Philadelphia, making a special report on "The Chemistry of Japan Porcelain and Porcelain Minerals," and in 1877 the degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by Stevens institute of technology. From 1868 till 1874 he was editor of the "American Gas-Light Journal," and he was assistant editor in the chemical department of "Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia." He has made numerous reports to various corporations, and is the author of about sixty scientific memoirs.

WYANT, Alexander H., artist, b. in Port Washington, Ohio, 11 Jan., 1836. He studied under Hans Gude in Carlsruhe, and also in London. After his return to this country he was elected an associate of the National academy in 1868, and an academician the following year. Among his works in oil are "A Storm" (1861); "Staten Island, from the Jersey Meadows" (1867); "Scene on the Upper Susquehanna" (1869); "Shore of Lake Champlain" and "Pool on the Ausable" (1871); "View on Lake George" (1875); "Wilds of the Adirondacks" (1876); "An Old Clearing" (1877); "Anywhither" (1883); and "Evening" (1885). His water-colors include "Scene on the Upper Little Miami" (1867); "New Jersey Meadows" (1870); "Sunset on the Prairie" (1876); "Late Autumn, Ausable River" (1877); and "Reminiscence of the Connecticut" (1878).

WYATT, Sir Francis, governor of Virginia, b. in England about 1575; d. in Bexley, Kent, England, in 1644. He was appointed governor of Virginia in 1621 to succeed Sir George Yeardley, and with a fleet of nine sail arrived there in October of that year. He was accompanied by his brother, Rev. Haut Wyatt, as clergyman of the party, William Claiborne as surveyor, John Pott as physician, and George Sandys, the translator of the "Metamorphoses of Ovid," as treasurer. Sir Francis brought with him a new constitution for the colony, by which all former immunities and franchises were confirmed, trial by jury was secured, and the assembly was privileged to meet annually upon the call of the governor, who was vested with the right of veto. No act of that body was to be valid unless it should be ratified by the Virginia company; but, on the other hand, no order of the company was to be obligatory without the concurrence of the assembly. This famous ordinance furnished the model of every subsequent form of government in the Anglo-American colonies. During his first year of governorship 21 vessels arrived in Virginia, bringing more than 1,300 settlers; but in March, 1622, the Indians rose and massacred 347 persons, including 10 members of the council, and the remainder of his service was disturbed by continual strife with the savages; but he persisted in giving larger liberties to the people, and in March, 1623, appointed monthly courts. He was wise and pacific in his management, and the colony grew and prospered. Meanwhile the Virginia company incurred the ill-will of King James by its opposition to his appointment of its officers. He sent commissioners to Virginia to gather material to work its ruin, and on 16 June, 1624, its charter was annulled; but Sir Francis was continued as governor by royal commission, and retained in 1625 by Charles I. The death of his father, Sir John Wyatt, recalled him in 1626; but he returned in 1639, and, displacing Sir John Harvey, who had offended the king, held the governorship till 1642, when he was succeeded by Sir William Berkeley.

WYATT, William Edward, clergyman, b. in New Manchester, Nova Scotia, 9 July, 1789; d. in Baltimore, Md., 24 June, 1864. He was graduated at Columbia in 1809, entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, was ordered deacon in 1810, and ordained priest in 1813. He settled in Baltimore as associate rector of St. Paul's parish in 1814, succeeded to the full pastorate in 1827, and occupied that charge until his death. He was president of the standing committee of the diocese of Maryland for many years, and president of the house of deputies of the general convention from 1828 till 1853, when he declined re-election. He published several occasional discourses and "Christian Offices, for the Use of Families and Individuals" (New York, 1825), and "The Parting Spirit's Address to His Mother" (1863).

WYCKOFF, Isaac Newton, clergyman, b. in Hillsborough, Somerset co., N. J., 29 Aug., 1792; d. in Albany, N. Y., 28 March, 1869. He taught to obtain means to enter college, was graduated at Rutgers in 1813, and at New Brunswick theological seminary in 1817, and while a student at the latter institution was principal of a young ladies' school in New Brunswick. He was pastor of the 1st Reformed Dutch church in Leeds, N. Y., in 1817-'34, of that in Catskill in 1834-'6, and of the 2d Reformed Dutch church in Albany in 1836-'66. During the last-named pastorate 1,000 persons were received into his church. He received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1838, and from Rutgers in 1839. Dr. Wyckoff was an able and at times an eloquent preacher. He was active in benevolent and educational enterprises, and a volunteer commissioner of immigration to the numerous Hollanders that came to the vicinity of Albany between 1845 and 1865. He contributed to the religious press and to Dr. William B. Sprague's "Annals of the American Pulpit," and published seventeen sermons (Albany, 1827-'66).

WYCKOFF, William Henry, educator, b. in New York city, 10 Sept., 1807; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 2 Nov., 1877. His father, the Rev. Cornelius C. Wyckoff, was a well-known clergyman in the Baptist church. William was graduated at Union college in 1828, and was the principal of the classical department in schools in New York city, where he fitted a larger number of pupils for Columbia and the University of New York than any other private instructor. He founded the "Baptist Advocate" (now the "Examiner") in 1839, edited it till 1846, aided in organizing the American and foreign Bible society in 1835, and the American Bible union in 1850, was corresponding secretary of the former in 1846-'50, and held the same office in the latter in 1850-'77. He was called to the ministry by the Laight street Baptist church, New York city, in 1846, and subsequently frequently filled vacant pulpits, although he accepted no settled charge. Madison university gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1858. Dr. Wyckoff had a scholarly acquaintance with most of the European languages, made himself proficient in Hebrew during his later life, and, says Prof. Charles Anthon, "had no superior in this country in his knowledge of Latin and Greek." He was a manager of the American Sunday-school union, and for many years president of the Young men's city Bible society and the Baptist domestic mission society. He was the author of several educational and religious works, including "The American Bible Society and the Baptists" (New York, 1841); "Documentary History of the American Bible Union" (4 vols., 1857-'67); and he edited an abridged edition of Charles Rollins's "Ancient History" (1848).—His son, William Cornelius, editor, b. in New York city, 28 May, 1832; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 2 May, 1888, was educated in his native city, became a book-keeper in a banking establishment, and was connected with various commercial enterprises till 1861, when he became chief clerk of the National bank-note company. He subsequently engaged in the real estate business, was scientific editor of the New York "Tribune" in 1869-'78, and from the latter date until his death was secretary of the American silk association. He was an associate editor of the "Science News" in 1879-'80, U. S. government expert for the statistics of the American silk industry in 1880-'3, and in 1886-'8 editor of "The American Magazine." While he was a member of the staff of the New York "Tribune" he reported the annual meetings of the American association for the advancement of science, his work obtaining wide recognition as the best scientific reports that were ever made for a daily paper. He wrote many valuable papers on the subject of silk industries, and is the author of "Silk Goods in America" (New York, 1879), and "American Silk-Manufacture" (1887).

WYETH, John Allan, surgeon, b. in Missionary Station, Marshall co., Ala., 26 May, 1845. He was educated at Lagrange military academy, Ala., and served as a private in the 4th Alabama cavalry during the civil war. After his graduation at the medical department of the University of Louisville in 1869 he settled in Guntersville, Ala., but in 1872 he removed to New York city, and was graduated at Bellevue hospital medical college in 1873. Dr. Wyeth practised as a physician and surgeon until 1882, and since that time has devoted himself to surgery. He was assistant demonstrator of anatomy at Bellevue hospital medical college in 1873-'6, and in 1874-'7 prosecutor to the chair of anatomy, also during the same years instructor in anatomy, physiology, and materia medica. He was the founder of the New York polyclinic and hospital, in which he became professor of surgery and secretary of the faculty. This was the first post-graduate medical school in this country, having been organized in 1880-'1 and opened in 1882, and had in its attendance, until the winter term of 1888-'9, more than 1,400 practitioners of medicine. Dr. Wyeth was president of the New York pathological society in 1885-'6. The Bellevue alumni association prize was awarded to him in 1876 for an essay on "The Surgery and Surgical Anatomy of the Tibio-Tarsal Articulation," and he received the first prize of the American medical association in 1878 for an essay on "The Surgical Anatomy and Surgery of the Carotid Arteries" and the second prize in the same year for an essay on "The Surgical Anatomy and Surgery of the Innominate and the Subclavian Arteries." He has published "Essays on Surgical Anatomy and Surgery" (New York, 1879), and a "Text-Book on Surgery" (1887).

WYLIE, Andrew, clergyman, b. in Washington, Pa., 12 April, 1789; d. in Bloomington, Ind., 11 Nov., 1851. He was graduated at Jefferson college, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1810, was tutor in the college for a year, studied theology, and was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Ohio, 21 Oct., 1812, being installed as pastor at Miller's Run, 23 June, 1813. He was president of Jefferson college, in 1812-'16, and of Washington college in 1817-'28, was elected president of Indiana college in 1818, and removing to Bloomington, Ind., in 1829, held this post during life. He changed his ecclesiastical relations in 1841, was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in New Albany in December, 1841, by Bishop Kemper, and priest in Vincennes, Ind., in May, 1842, by the same bishop. He received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1825. Dr. Wylie published several sermons on special occasions (1816-'51); "English Grammar" (1822); "Eulogy on General Lafayette" (1834); "Sectarianism is Heresy, with its Nature, Evils, and Remedy" (3 parts, 1840); and baccalaureate and other addresses. He contributed freely to reviews and magazines, and left at his death ready for publication works on "Rhetoric" and "Advice to the Young."

WYLIE, Robert, artist, b. in the Isle of Man in 1839; d. in Brittany, France, 4 Feb., 1877. He was brought to the United States in childhood, and first studied art at the Pennsylvania academy. In 1863 he went to France, and in 1872 he received a second-class medal at the Paris salon. His professional career was in France, and his pictures deal mostly with the life of the Breton peasants. His "Death of a Vendean Chief" (1876-'7) is in the Metropolitan museum, New York.

WYLIE, Samuel Brown, clergyman, b. in Moylurg, County Antrim, Ireland, 21 May, 1773; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Oct., 1852. He was graduated at the University of Glasgow in 1797, and taught for a short time in Ballymena, Ireland, but was compelled to leave the country in consequence of his efforts in favor of Irish independence. He arrived in the United States in October, 1797, taught in Cheltenham, Pa., and in 1798 became a tutor in the University of Pennsylvania, subsequently establishing a private academy in Philadelphia, which he successfully conducted for many years. Soon after his arrival in this country he studied theology under the care of the Reformed Presbyterian church, and was licensed to preach in 1799. He was a delegate to the convention of the Reformed Presbyterian church in Ireland and Scotland in 1802, and on his return was called to the pastorate of the 1st Reformed Presbyterian church of Philadelphia, which he held until his death, a period of fifty-one years. When the theological seminary of his church was organized in 1809, he became a professor there, and held office till 1851. In 1828-'45 he occupied the chair of languages in the University of Pennsylvania, of which he was vice-provost in 1838-'45. Dickinson gave him the degree of D. D. in 1816. Dr. Wylie was an eminent classical and Oriental scholar, a contributor to the American philosophical society, an assistant editor of the "Presbyterian" in 1821-'2, and the author of "The Faithful Ministry of Magistracy and Ministry upon a Scriptural Basis" (Philadelphia, 1804), and "Life of Alexander McLeod" (1855). He also compiled a Greek grammar (1838). See memoirs of him by Rev. John D. McLeod (New York, 1852), and Rev. Gilbert McMaster (Philadelphia, 1852).—His son, Theophilus Adam, educator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Oct., 1810, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1830, and became an assistant in the academic department of that institution. In 1837 he accepted the chair of natural philosophy and chemistry in Indiana university, and in 1852 he became professor of mathematics in Miami university, but three years later he returned to his former post. He was transferred to the chair of ancient languages in 1864, and during 1859 was acting president of the university. In 1886 he withdrew from active work and was made professor emeritus. Prof. Wylie was ordained as a clergyman in the Reformed Presbyterian church in 1838, and was pastor of that church in Bloomington, Ind., in 1838-'52 and 1855-'69. He has in preparation a "History of the University of Indiana," with sketches of the faculty and graduates.—Another son, Theodore William John, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, 3 Oct., 1818, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1836, studied theology, was ordained to the ministry of the Reformed Presbyterian church, and in 1838 became associate pastor with his father of the 1st church in Philadelphia. When the latter died in 1852, the son succeeded him as pastor. He was corresponding secretary of the board of missions of his church in 1843-'9, professor in the Reformed Presbyterian theological seminary in 1847-'51, 1854-'7, and 1859-'69, and edited the "Missionary Advocate" in 1838-'41 and the "Banner of the Covenant" in 1845-'55. The University of New York gave him the degree of D. D. in 1859. Dr. Wylie is the author of an "English, Latin, and Greek Vocabulary" (Philadelphia, 1839); "The God of our Fathers" (1854); and "Washington as a Christian" (1862).

WYLLY, William, jurist, b. in a southern state in 1757; d. in Devonshire, England, in 1828. He adhered to the crown in the Revolution, and, removing to New Brunswick, became the first king's counsel and registrar of the court of vice-admiralty in that province. In 1787 he went with his family to the Bahama islands, where, in 1788, he was appointed solicitor-general and surrogate of the court of vice-admiralty. In 1804 he was appointed advocate-general of the vice-admiralty court, in 1812 he became chief justice, and in 1822 chief justice of the island of St. Vincent.

WYLLYS, George, governor of Connecticut, b. in Fenny Compton, Warwick, England, about 1570; d. in Hartford, Conn., 9 March, 1645. He was liberally educated, and after a course at one of the English universities settled on his large estate in Knapton, Warwick. He ardently espoused the cause of the Puritans, and in 1636 sent his steward, William Gibbons, with twenty men, "to purchase and prepare for him in Hartford, Conn., an estate suitable to his rank," on which Gibbons was directed to build a house, and prepare for the reception of his master's family. Wyllys arrived in 1638, and at once became an important member of the colony. He was a framer of the constitution in 1639, and at the first election that was held under it was chosen one of the six magistrates of Connecticut, holding office until his death. He was chosen deputy governor in 1641, and governor in 1642. Gov. Wyllys was famed for his social and domestic virtues, his simplicity of manners, and his love for civil and religious liberty.—His son, Samuel, magistrate, b. in Warwick, England, in 1632; d. in Hartford, Conn., 30 May, 1709, came to this country with his father in 1638, was graduated at Harvard in 1653, and in 1654 was elected one of the magistrates of Connecticut. In this office and the corresponding one of assistant under the charter of Charles II. he was retained by annual election for more than thirty years. On his estate, and in front of his house, the charter of Connecticut, according to the common account, was concealed in a large hollow tree, to secure it from Sir Edmund Andros (see ANDROS, EDMUND, and TREAT, ROBERT), and it remained there until his deposition from the governorship on the accession of William and Mary. This tree, which was called the Charter Oak, was said to be 1,000 years old. There is a legend that when Gov. Wyllys's steward, Gibbons, was about to cut it down, a deputation of Indians remonstrated, and it was allowed to remain. It stood for 169 years after the charter was concealed in it, but was prostrated by a violent gale of wind in August, 1856.—George's grandson, George, secretary of the colony of Connecticut, b. in Hartford, Conn., 6 Oct., 1710; d. there, 24 April, 1796, was the son of Hezekiah Wyllys, who was secretary of the colony in 1712-'30. George was graduated at Yale in 1729, and, in consequence of the failure of his father's health, was chosen secretary pro tempore in 1730, becoming his successor in 1734. He held that office for sixty subsequent years, during which he attended every session of the legislature. He was town-clerk of Hartford from 1730 until his death, became a captain of militia in 1738, and held a commission of lieutenant-colonel in the French war in 1757. Notwithstanding the fact that he was in active sympathy with the loyalist element during the Revolution, his tenure of office was not interrupted. He married Mary, daughter of Rev. Timothy Woodbridge.—Their son, Samuel, soldier, b. in Hartford, Conn., 15 Jan., 1739; d. there, 9 June, 1823, was graduated at Yale in 1758. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of Col. Joseph Spencer's regiment in 1775, commanded a regiment at the siege of Boston, and in January, 1776, became a colonel in the Connecticut line, serving throughout the Revolution. He then returned to Hartford, held several civil offices, and in 1796 succeeded his father as secretary of Connecticut, which post he held until failing health caused his resignation in 1809, when the office had been occupied by his grandfather, his father, and himself, in uninterrupted succession for ninety-eight years. He was a member of the Connecticut academy of arts and sciences, and for many years brigadier-general and major-general of militia.

WYMAN, Morrill, physician, b. in Chelmsford, Mass., 25 July, 1812. He was graduated at Harvard in 1833, and at the medical department in 1837. Meanwhile he served as assistant engineer on the Boston and Worcester railroad during 1833, and during 1836 was house physician to the Massachusetts general hospital. On the completion of his medical studies he settled in Cambridge, where he has since followed his profession. In 1853 he became adjunct professor of the theory and practice of medicine in Harvard, but he relinquished this chair after three years' occupation. He invented in 1850 an instrument for removing fluids from the cavities of the body, especially the chest, consisting essentially of a trocar and cannula of a very small diameter fitted to an exhausting-syringe. By its use an operation, which was previously considered dangerous, and was often fatal, has been rendered effectual, safe, and almost painless. Dr. Wyman is a member of the Massachusetts medical society and of the American academy of arts and sciences. In 1875 he was elected an overseer of Harvard, and he has since been re-elected. The degree of LL. D. was given him by Harvard in 1885. He has published a "Memoir of Daniel Treadwell" (Cambridge, 1888), and in book-form "A Practical Treatise on Ventilation" (Cambridge, 1846); "Progress in School Discipline" (1868); and "Autumnal Catarrh" (New York, 1872).—His brother, Jeffries, comparative anatomist, b. in Chelmsford, Mass., 11 Aug., 1814; d. in Bethlehem, N. H., 4 Sept., 1874, was graduated at Harvard in 1833, and at the medical school in 1837. In 1836

he was appointed house physician in the Massachusetts general hospital. He settled in Boston, became demonstrator of anatomy under Dr. John C. Warren, was appointed curator of the newly founded Lowell institute in 1839, and in 1840-'1 delivered a course of twelve lectures on comparative anatomy and physiology. With the money that he derived from this source he went to Europe and studied human anatomy at the School of medicine, and comparative anatomy at the Jardin des plantes in Paris, after which he spent some time at the Royal college of surgeons in London. He returned to Boston in 1843, and in the autumn accepted the professorship of anatomy and physiology in Hampden Sidney college, Va., where he continued for five years, except during the summers which he spent in Boston. In 1847 he was appointed to the chair of anatomy in Harvard, succeeding Dr. John C. Warren, remained at the head of the department until his death, and during all the time he was noted as a clear and conscientious teacher and lecturer. He at once began the formation of a Museum of comparative anatomy, which was one of the earliest in this country, and is intended to show some of the important modifications of the organs of animals in connection with the physiological processes of which they are the seat, as well as the conditions of embryological development and the successive phases through which the embryo passes. After his death it became the property of the Boston society of natural history. In 1849 he delivered a second course of lectures before the Lowell institute on "Comparative Physiology," which gained for him a high rank among American anatomists and physiologists. In 1856 he visited Surinam, Guiana, and penetrated in canoes far into the interior, making important researches upon the ground, and enriching his museum with animals of great anatomical interest. He made a voyage to La Plata river in 1858-'9, ascended the Uruguay and the Parana in a small iron steamer, and then crossed the pampas to Mendoza, and the Cordilleras to Santiago and Valparaiso, whence he returned by way of the Peruvian coast and the Isthmus of Panama. His investigations were first in the domain of comparative anatomy and physiology and then in palæontology, but with his great knowledge of the branches he was able in later years to concentrate his maturer powers on investigations in ethnology, and more especially in archæology. Of his early studies, that "On the External Characters, Habits, and Osteology of the Gorilla" (1847) was the first scientific description of that animal, whose specific name of gorilla was bestowed on it by Dr. Wyman. His paper "On the Nervous System of the Bull-Frog," published by the Smithsonian institution (1853), is said to be the "clearest introduction to the most complex of animal structures" that was issued up to that time. He was also the author of a series of papers on the anatomy of the blind fish of the Mammoth cave. To this subject, and to the comparative anatomy of the higher apes, he returned from time to time as material was afforded. He exposed the fraudulent nature of the skeleton called the Hydrachus Sillimani, alleged to be that of an extinct sea-serpent. His "Observations on the Development of the Skate" (1864) showed most conclusively that it ranks higher than the shark, since the latter retains through life a general form resembling one of the stages through which the former passes during its development. One of his most interesting researches was "Observations and Experiments on Living Organisms in Heated Water" (1867), which showed that no life appeared in water that is boiled more than five hours. Although reluctant to express an opinion on the subjects of spontaneous generation and the theory of descent, still his experiments convinced him that the former does not exist, and his teaching was favorable to the latter. He was a member of the faculty of the Museum of comparative zoölogy from the first, and he taught comparative anatomy in the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard. On the foundation of the Peabody museum of American ethnology and archæology at Cambridge in 1866, he was named as one of the seven trustees, and was chosen its curator by his associates. Under these circumstances his work naturally tended toward archæology, and, spending his winters in Florida, he was led to investigate the ancient shell-heaps there. In these he found evidences of prehistoric peoples, one of which was cannibal in its habits. He also discovered and studied similar refuse-piles along the coast of New England. He published several papers on this subject in the "American Naturalist" and in the "Reports of the Trustees of the Peabody Museum" (7 vols., Cambridge, 1867-'74), but his results are most fully given in a posthumous memoir on the "Fresh-water Shell-mounds of the St. John's River, Florida" (Salem, 1875). Prof. Wyman was a member of the Linnean society of London, and of the Anthropological institute of Great Britain and Ireland, and, besides membership in various other societies in this country, was a fellow and councillor of the American academy of arts and sciences. In 1856 he was chosen president of the American association for the advancement of science, but he was unable to be present at the subsequent meeting. His relations with the Boston society of natural history were very close. From 1839 to 1841 he was its recording secretary, and then successively curator of ichthyology and herpetology and comparative anatomy, and from 1856 to 1870

he was its president. He was one of the corporate members of the National academy of sciences, named by act of congress in 1863, and, although he soon resigned, his name was retained on the list of honorary members. His bibliography includes 175 titles, a full list of which, compiled by Alpheus S. Packard, accompanies the sketch of Dr. Wyman by him, which is published in the "Biographical Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences" (vol. ii., Washington, 1886). Asa Gray, Oliver Wendell Holmes, S. Weir Mitchell, Frederick W. Putnam, and Burt G. Wilder published sketches of his life, and James Russell Lowell a memorial sonnet.

WYMAN, Thomas White, naval officer, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 24 March, 1793; d. in Florence, Italy, 24 Feb., 1854. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 17 Dec., 1810, was commissioned lieutenant, 27 April, 1816, was promoted to commander, 9 Feb., 1837, commanded the receiving-ship at Boston in 1837, and the sloop "John Adams" on the East India station, 1838-'40. He was promoted to captain, 2 March, 1842, commanded the flagship "Columbus," 1845-'8, on the Pacific station during the Mexican war, in which he participated in most of the operations on the Pacific coast of California and Mexico. He was commandant of Portsmouth navy-yard in 1849-'51, and was appointed to the "Vermont" to cruise in the East Indies, but he went abroad on a leave of absence, and died there.—His son, Robert Harris, naval officer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 12 July, 1822; d. in Washington, D. C., 2 Dec., 1882, entered the navy as a midshipman, 11 March, 1837, attended the naval school at Philadelphia in 1842-'3, and became a passed midshipman, 29 June, 1843. He was acting master in the frigate "Brandywine" in 1843-'6, and during the Mexican war served in the Gulf squadron, with which he participated in the siege and capture of Vera Cruz, and the expeditions that captured Tuspan and Tampico, with many prizes, in 1847. He served at the naval observatory at Washington in 1848-'50, was promoted to lieutenant, 16 July, 1850, and was again attached to the observatory in 1853-'4. When the civil war began he commanded the steamer "Yankee" from July till October, 1861, the steamer "Pawnee" in the South Atlantic squadron at the capture of Port Royal in 1861, and then the Potomac flotilla, by which he kept the river open and silenced the Confederate batteries on the banks. He was promoted to commander, 16 July, 1862, had the steamer "Wachusett" on the Potomac in 1862-'3, and the "Santiago de Cuba" on the blockade in 1863-'4. He was commissioned captain, 25 July, 1866, and in October, 1869, appointed chief hydrographer of the navy at Washington, where he remained eight years and acquired an enviable reputation for the excellence of his hydrographic work. He was promoted to commodore, 19 July, 1872, and to rear-admiral, 26 April, 1878, was commander-in-chief of the North Atlantic fleet in 1879-'82, and in May, 1882, appointed a member of the light-house board, of which he became chairman, 5 June, 1882. He was stricken with apoplexy at his desk in the treasury department, and died the same night.

WYNKOOP, Henry, member of the Continental congress, b. in Northampton county, Pa., 2 March, 1737; d. in Bucks county, Pa., 25 March, 1816. His ancestor, Gerardus, settled in Moreland, Philadelphia county, Pa., in 1717. Henry received a classical education and early espoused the patriot cause. He was a member of the Northampton county committee of observation in 1774, a deputy to the provincial conference of 15 July of that year, and of the provincial conference that met in Carpen-ter's Hall, Philadelphia, on 18 June, 1775. About the same time he became a major of one of the associated battalions. He served on the general committee of safety from July, 1776, till July, 1777, was chosen by the General assembly one of the commissioners to settle the accounts of county lieutenants, 4 Dec., 1778, and on 3 March, 1779, when Edward Biddle resigned his seat in congress, was chosen in his place, being re-elected, 24 Nov., 1780, and 22 Nov., 1781. He was commissioned a justice of the court of common pleas and the orphans' court on 18 Nov., 1780, and held office till 27 June, 1789, when he was elected to the first congress of the United States, serving till 1791. He was then appointed an associate judge of Bucks county, which post he held until his death.

WYNN, Richard, soldier, b. in eastern Virginia about 1750; d. in Tennessee in 1813. He entered the Continental service early in the Revolutionary war, and in 1775 was a lieutenant of South Carolina rangers, participating in the battle on Sullivan's island. He was then placed in command of Fort McIntosh, Ga., promoted colonel, and transferred to the charge of the militia in Fairfield district, S. C. He fought at Hanging Rock, where he was wounded, and was actively engaged during the remainder of the war. At its close he became brigadier-general of militia, and then major-general. He afterward settled in South Carolina, was a representative in the 3d congress, and served by re-election from 1809 till 1813.

WYNNE, James, physician, b. in Utica, N. Y., in 1814; d. in Guatemala, Central America, 11 Feb., 1871. He was a lineal descendant of Sir John Wynn, of Gwydyr, Wales. He was educated at the University of the city of New York, studied medicine, and was licensed to practise, settling in Baltimore, Md. Later he removed to New York city, where he devoted much attention to the subject of life insurance and medical jurisprudence, contributing to the "Transactions of the American Medical Society," to the "North American Review," "Knickerbocker," and other standard magazines, and about 1867 he emigrated to Guatemala, where he engaged in coffee-culture. He published valuable reports, including "Public Hygiene" (New York, 1847); "Asiatic Cholera in the United States in 1847," prepared at the request of the British government, from which he received a medal (London, 1852); and one on the "Vital Statistics of the United States," made to the Mutual life insurance company of New York and London (New York, 1857). His other works are "Mémorial of Maj. Samuel Ringgold" (Baltimore, 1847); "Lives of Eminent Literary and Scientific Men of America" (New York, 1850); "Importance of the Study of Legal Medicine" (New York, 1857); and "The Private Libraries of New York" (1863).

WYNNS, Thomas, soldier, b. in Hertford county, N. C., in 1764; d. there, 3 June, 1825. He was the youngest of four brothers, all of whom, except himself, were Revolutionary soldiers. In 1780 he was captured at sea in a vessel called the "Fair American," and, with several other colonists, was carried to London. He returned after the peace, settled in his native county as a planter, and in 1788 was a member of the North Carolina convention that acted on the constitution of the United States. Mr. Wynns became state senator in 1790, and held that office continuously till 1817, with the exception of his service in congress. He was chosen to that body in 1802, and held his seat by re-election in 1803-'7. He was a member of the executive council and a brigadier-general of militia. Winston, N. C., is named in his honor.

WYTHE, George, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Elizabeth City county, Va., in 1726; d. in Richmond, Va., 8 June, 1806. His father was a wealthy planter, and his mother, who possessed unusual intelligence and learning, gave him his early education. Under her tuition he became an accomplished Latin and Greek scholar, an excellent mathematician, acquired a liberal knowledge of the sciences, and was further instructed at William and Mary; but the death of both parents before he attained his majority and the consequent uncontrolled possession of a large fortune led him into extravagance and dissipation. He reformed when he was about thirty years old, studied law under John Lewis, an eminent practitioner, and quickly rose to the front rank at the Virginia bar. Early in life he was chosen to the house of burgesses, where he was recognized as one of the leaders, and he continued to serve until the beginning of the Revolution. On 14 Nov., 1764, he was appointed a member of its committee to prepare and report a petition to the king, a memorial to the house of lords, and a remonstrance to the house of commons on the proposed stamp-act. He drew up the last-named paper, but it so far exceeded the demands of his colleagues in boldness and truth that it was viewed as bordering on treason, and accepted only after much modification. From that time he continued to exert all his influence in favor of the independence of the colonies, and in August, 1775, he was appointed a delegate to the Continental congress from Virginia, signing the Declaration of Independence on 4 July of the next year. On 5 Nov., 1776, he was appointed by the legislature, with Thomas Jefferson, Edmund Pendleton, George Mason, and Thomas Ludwell Lee, to a committee to revise the state laws of British and coloonial enactment, and to prepare bills for re-enacting them with such alterations as were required under the new government. Mason and Lee did not serve, but so industrious were the other three members of the committee that on 18 June, 1779, they had prepared 126 bills, which they reported to the assembly. He became speaker of the house of delegates in 1777, the same year was chosen one of the three judges of the chancery court of Virginia, and, on the reorganization of the court of equity, was constituted sole chancellor, which post he held for more than twenty years. Before the close of the Revolution, debts had been incurred between American and British merchants, and the recovery of these was the subject of the 6th article of John Jay's treaty with Great Britain, but popular feeling was strong against legal decrees in favor of British claimants. Chancellor Wythe was the first judge in the United States that decided the claims to be recoverable. He lost almost all his property during the Revolution, but he supplemented his small income as chancellor, which was £300 a year, by accepting the professorship of law in William and Mary, which he held in 1779-'89. In the latter year his arduous duties compelled his resignation, and he removed to Richmond, Va. In December, 1786, he was chosen a member of the convention that framed the constitution of the United States, and he regularly attended its sessions, but, being absent on the last day, failed to sign the constitution. He was subsequently twice a presidential elector. In the latter part of his life he emancipated his slaves, furnishing them with means of support until they learned to take care of themselves. In the eighty-first year of his age, while he was still in the full vigor of his intellect and the exercise of the duties of the chancellorship, he was poisoned. His nephew, George Wythe Sweeny, was tried for the crime, but was acquitted. William and Mary gave Judge Wythe the degree of LL. D. in 1790. He was twice married, but his only child died in infancy. Among his pupils were two presidents of the United States, a chief justice, and others who attained high rank in the legal profession. Thomas Jefferson, his law pupil and devoted adherent, said of him in notes that he made in 1820 for a biography of Wythe, which he never completed: "No man ever left behind him a character more venerated than George Wythe. His virtue was of the purest kind, his integrity inflexible, his justice exact. He might truly be called the Cato of his country, without the avarice of the Roman, for a more disinterested person never lived. He was of middle size, his face manly, comely, and engaging. Such was George Wythe, the honor of his own and the model of future times." The engraving shows his house in Williamsburg, Va. He published "Decisions in Virginia by the High Court of Chancery, with Remarks upon Decrees by the Court of Appeals" (Richmond, 1795; 2d ed., with a memoir by Benjamin B. Minor (1852).

WYTHE, Joseph Henry, physician, b. in Manchester, England, 19 March, 1822. He removed to this country in 1835, was licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal church in 1842, but decided to study medicine. He was graduated at the Pennsylvania medical college in 1853, and began to practise in Port Carbon, Pa., where he was for three years surgeon to the Beaver Meadow collieries. In 1862-'3 he served as surgeon of U. S. volunteers, organizing Camp Parole hospital, Alexandria, Va. After the war he removed to the west, and in 1865-'9 was president of Willamette university, Oregon, organizing the medical department of that institution, and, having again united with the conference, preached in the Methodist Episcopal church. He subsequently settled in San Francisco, Cal., and became professor of microscopy and histology in the Medical college of the Pacific. He has published many professional papers, and is the author of "The Microscopist" (Philadelphia, 1850); "Curiosities of the Microscope" (1852); "Physician's Pocket Dose- and Prescription-Book" (1852); "Agreement of Science and Revelation" (1883); "Easy Lessons in Vegetable Biology" (New York, 1883); and "The Science of Life" (1884).

XIMENES, Francisco (hee-may'-nes), Spanish clergyman, b. in Ecija, Andalusia, about 1600; d. in Guatemala about 1680. He became vicar of the parish of Santo Tomas Chuila, or Chichicastenango, where he discovered a valuable manuscript in the Quiche dialect about the early history of Guatemala, which is best known under the name of Popol-Vuh. He translated it into Spanish, and it has since been used by many historians. Ximenes was afterward provincial of the Dominican order for the province of San Vicente de Chiapa and Guatemala, which post he retained till his death. He was very proficient in Quiche, Zutuhil, and Cakchiquel, and wrote sermons and several religious works in these languages, his manuscripts being preserved in the library of the Dominican convent in the city of Guatemala, and a manuscript copy, made and signed by Father Antonio Garcia, of Ximenes's "Vocabulario de la Lengua Cakchiquel" was recently sold in Paris for 200 francs. His works include also the manuscripts "Historia de la provincia de San Vicente de Chiapa" (4 vols.) and "De las cosas maravillosas de esta América." His translation of the Popol-Vuh, under the title of "Empiezan las Historias del Origen de los Indios de esta Provincia de Guatemala, traducidas de la lengua Quiché" was also kept in the convent, and a copy was published under the title of "Historia del Origen de los Indios en la provincia de Guatemala" (Vienna, 1857). It was until recently considered the only original document on the early history of Guatemala, and was mentioned as such by Ferdinand Denis, Henry Ternaux-Compans, and Brasseur de Bourbourg, but the latter discovered in 1860 a Quiche copy of the Popol-Vuh, and published the text with a French translation (Paris, 1861).

XIMÉNEZ, Francisco (hee-may'-nayth), Spanish missionary, b. in Estremadura in the latter half of the 15th century; d. in Mexico, 31 July, 1537. He studied in the University of Salamanca, where he was graduated in theology, and entered the Franciscan order in the convent of San Gabriel in Estremadura. He was one of the twelve missionaries that accompanied Fray Martin de Valencia in 1523 to Mexico, and became thoroughly acquainted with the Mexican language, in which he was the first to write a grammar and a catechism. He was a successful missionary among the natives and founder of the convent of Quauuahac (now Cuernavaca), of which he became superior. He wrote a life of Fray Martin de Valencia and "Arte y Vocabulario en lengua Mexicana," which is still in manuscript.

XIUHTEMOC I. (see-oo'-ta-mock), first king of Culhuacan, lived in the 12th century. After the destruction of the empire of Tollan some of the scattered tribes settled at Culhuacan, and about 1104 elected their leader, Xiuhtemoc, king. He was succeeded in 1129 by his son, Nauhyotl.—Xiuhtemoc II. was eighth king of Culhuacan and second of Mexico. He succeeded his father, Acamapictli I., who had dethroned the former king, Cocox, two years before, in 1303, and in 1318, after the death of Huitzilihuitl I., he was elected by the Mexicans king, but gradually drew them to Culhuacan, while those that did not wish to follow him settled in Tlatelolco and formed there a separate monarchy. He was succeeded in 1352 by his grandson, Acamapictli II.

XIUTLALTZIN (see-oot-lahl-tzeen'), queen of Tollan, daughter of the 6th king, Mitl, whom she succeeded in 1038. She was the only woman that reigned over the Toltecs, Acolhuas, or Aztecs, but it seems that her husband, whose name is not even recorded, was either not entitled by his family to sovereign dignity, or that he died before Mitl's decease. After a short reign, which is eulogized as beneficial to the country, she was succeeded by her son, Tepancaltzin (q. v.), in 1042.

XOCHITL (soh-cheetl'), queen of Tollan, lived in the 11th century. She was the daughter of Papantzin, one of the principal nobles of King Tepancaltzin's court. Reports differ as to whether the latter or his beautiful daughter, whose name signifies "the flower," was the inventor of pulque, the Mexican fermented drink made from the juice of the aloe-plant. All authors agree that in 1049 her father sent her with a jar of the newly invented liquor to the palace, and the king was so pleased with the drink that he ordered her to bring it daily. Charmed by her beauty, he took her to his palace at Palpan, where she gave birth to a son, Topiltzin. When her father learned her situation, he upbraided the king, but was quieted by the promise that Xochitl should be acknowledged queen after the death of Tepancaltzin's legitimate consort, and that Topiltzin should be successor to the throne. This was done, but after the resignation of Tepancaltzin, in 1094, in his son's favor, the other Toltec princes rebelled, and in one of the battles both Xochitl and her husband were killed, and the Toltec monarchy was destroyed, as Topiltzin, with many of his followers, emigrated to the south, where, according to some historians, he settled in Yucatan; according to others, in Chiapas or Guatemala.

XOLOTL (soh-lotl'), "the vigilant," also sur-named "the great," founder of the Mexican dynasty of Tenayucan, or Texcoco, lived in the 12th century. He was chief of the Chichimec tribes that invaded Anahuac after the destruction of the Toltec monarchy, and, settling on the lake of Texcoco, he proclaimed himself king, about 1160. He recognized that the subjugated Toltecs, as well as the tribes of Aculhuas and Tecpanecs that arrived afterward in the valley were far superior to his own wild and warlike nation, and he therefore treated them kindly, so that they soon transformed the Chichimecs into a civilized race. To equalize the different tribes and dialects, he ordered the Nahuatl, or instructed, dialect, a form of the Toltec, to be adopted as the official language, which in time superseded all others, and is the equivalent of what is now generally called Aztec. King Xolotl constructed in Texcoco a temple to the sun, a palace, and gardens, and made that city the centre of the civilization of Anahuac. He married his daughters to the two principal chiefs of the Aculhuas, who became founders of the empire of Atzcapotzalco, and was succeeded about 1220 by his son, Nopaltzin.

XUÁREZ, Pedro, Indian cacique, b. in Mexico about the beginning of the 17th century. He was liberally educated, and was sexton of the church of San Pablo. He is chiefly known as the author of a manuscript work in the Aztec language, under the Spanish title of "Memorial en Lengua Mexicana sobre cosas memorables." It gives very valuable notes of historical events, and is frequently cited by Carlos de Sigüenza in his works.

YALE, Cyrus, clergyman, b. in Lee, Mass., 17 May, 1786; d. in New Hartford, Conn., 21 May, 1854. He was graduated at Williams in 1811, was licensed to preach by the Hartford north association, and was ordained pastor of the church in New Hartford, Conn., 12 Oct., 1814. He remained there till 24 Dec., 1834, when he resigned and was pastor at Ware, Mass., till 1837, after which he returned to his old congregation in New Hartford, and ministered there till his death. He published "Life of Rev. Jeremiah Halleck" (Hartford, 1828); "Miniature of the Life of the Rev. Alvan Hyde, D. D." (1852); "Biographical Sketches of the Ministers of Litchfield County after the Year 1800" (1852); and single sermons and addresses.

YALE, Elihu, philanthropist, b. in or near Boston, Mass., 5 April, 1649; d. in England, 8 July, 1721. His father, David, came to New Haven from England in 1638, but returned in 1651, and was followed in 1652 by his family, including Elihu, who never revisited this country. The son went to the East Indies about 1678, and in 1687-'92 was governor of Fort St. George, Madras, Gov.

Yale acquired great wealth in India. On 22 May, 1711, Jeremiah Dummer wrote from London to Rev. John Pierpont, then a trustee of the Collegiate school of Connecticut: "Here is Mr. Yale, formerly governor of Fort George in the Indies, who has got a prodigious estate, and, having no son, now sends for a relation of his from Connecticut to make him his heir. He told me lately that he intended to bestow a charity upon some college in Oxford under certain restrictions which he mentioned. But I think he should much rather do it to your college, seeing he is a New England and, I think, a Connecticut man. If, therefore, when his kinsman comes over, you will write him a proper letter on that subject, I will take care to press it home." The result was that between 1714 and 1721 Gov. Yale gave to the Collegiate school books and money whose total value was estimated at £800. The timeliness of these gifts, rather than their intrinsic value, made them a great aid to the struggling college, and in 1718, after its removal from Saybrook to New Haven, its trustees named the new collegiate building in the latter place Yale college. This name, applied at first only to the edifice, was given formally to the institution in the charter of 1745. President Thomas Clap says that Yale "was a gentleman who greatly abounded in good humor and generosity, as well as in wealth." He is buried in Wrexham, Wales, the ancient seat of his family. On his tomb is engraved an epitaph which contains the well-known couplet:

"Born in America, in Europe bred,

In Afric travelled, and in Asia wed."

A full-length portrait of Gov. Yale hangs in Alumni hall, Yale college. The accompanying illustration represents the completed corner of the quadrangle of buildings that is to inclose the college grounds. The original "Yale college" is not now standing, the oldest building on the grounds having been erected in 1752.

YALE, Elisha, clergyman, b. in Lee, Mass., 15 June, 1780; d. in Kingsborough, N. Y., 9 Jan., 1853. He was brought up on a farm, taught school in Richmond, Mass., in 1798-'9. and in Lenox in 1800, studied theology, and in 1803 was licensed to preach by the North association of Hartford county. He became pastor of the Presbyterian church at Kingsborough, N. Y., in 1804, and retained this charge till his resignation, 23 June, 1852. He published "Select Verse System, for the Use of Individuals, Families, and Schools" (Rochester, 1853), and single sermons and articles in periodicals, and left in manuscript a "Review of a Pastorate of Forty-eight Years" and "Helps to cultivate the Conscience."

YALE, Leroy Milton, physician, b. in Holmes' Hole (now Vineyard Haven), Mass., 12 Feb., 1841. He was graduated at Columbia in 1862, and at Bellevue hospital medical college in 1866, settled in New York city, and has since followed his profession there. In 1870 he was lecturer on obstetrics in the medical department of the University of Vermont, and since 1871 he has been instructor and lecturer on various branches—chiefly orthopedic surgery and diseases of children—in the Bellevue hospital medical college. He was surgeon to the Charity hospital from 1871 till 1877, when he was transferred to Bellevue hospital and continued there until 1882. During 1880-'5 he was similarly connected with the Presbyterian hospital. Dr. Yale is a member of the New York county medical society, the New York academy of medicine, and other professional bodies. His contributions to medical science consist of various articles to medical journals, but his principal literary work has been editorial contributions. He had charge of "The Medical Gazette" in 1867-'8, and has edited the medical part of "Babyhood" since its beginning in 1884.

YALE, Linus, inventor, b. in Salisbury, N. Y., 4 April, 1821; d. in New York city, 24 Dec., 1868. His ancestors were of the same family as Elihu Yale, and his father, Linus, was a successful inventor. The son devoted himself for a time to portrait-painting, but, having considerable mechanical skill and ingenuity, began in 1850 to study mechanical problems. He devised in that year a plan by which the key to locks for the protection of bankers' safes and vaults should be so constructed that, when its essential portion was doing its work within the lock, it should be at some distance removed from the key-hole through which it had entered, and at the same time isolated from the exterior of the door by a hardened steel plate, which automatically covered the key-hole behind it. This device he patented in 1851, and thereafter until his death he was a recognized authority on all matters pertaining to locks and safes. His first patent was followed by others for bankers' safes, and for bankers' flat-key and common locks. He patented in 1858 a device for adjusting at a right angle the joiners' square, in 1865 one for reversing the motion of screw-taps, and in 1868 two for improvements in mechanics' vises, and he also obtained patents abroad for certain of his inventions. In the course of his experience he became convinced of the necessity of abandoning the use of a key-hole, as it afforded an easy introduction for gunpowder or other explosive. This led to the adoption of the permanent dial and shaft as used in the so-called "combination locks," and subsequently to the perfection of the mechanism that is known as the clock lock. His most radical invention was the double lock, which consisted in practically placing two within one case, to be operated by the same or different combinations so that the unlocking of either allowed the bolt to be withdrawn. His improvements in locks and boxes for post-office use are of recognized utility and world-wide adoption. He was an exhibitor at the world's fairs of this and other countries, and was the recipient of gold, silver, and bronze medals as first awards at these exhibitions.

YANCEY, Bartlett, member of congress, b. in Caswell county, N. C., about 1780; d. there, 30 Aug., 1828. He was educated at the University of North Carolina, was a tutor in that institution, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, becoming eminent in his profession. He was a representative in congress from North Carolina in 1813-'17, was elected a state senator in 1817, was annually re-elected till his death, and generally presided as speaker. With John L. Taylor and Henry Potter he published "Laws of the State of North Carolina" (2 vols., Raleigh, 1821).

YANCEY, William Lowndes, statesman, b. in Ogeechee Shoals, Ga., 10 Aug., 1814; d. near Montgomery, Ala., 28 July, 1863. He was the son of Benjamin C. Yancey, a lawyer of Abbeville, S. C., was educated at Williams college, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Abbeville. In 1836 he removed to Alabama, and was admitted to the bar. He edited the "Cahawba Democrat" and the "Wetumpka Argus." He served in both branches of the legislature, and was elected to congress in 1844 to fill a vacancy, and re-elected in 1845, but resigned in 1847 to devote his entire attention to law. In 1845 he was challenged to a duel by Gen. Thomas L. Clingman, but neither was injured in the encounter that ensued. He was a member of the National Democratic convention that met at Baltimore in May, 1848, a zealous opponent of the compromise measures of 1850, a presidential elector in 1856, and one of the leaders of the extreme party in the south. In a letter written in June, 1858, and published in 1860, he advised the organization of committees of safety in all the cotton states to "fire the southern heart," and ultimately to precipitate those states into revolution; and in 1859 he urged the calling of a convention by the state of Alabama, in the event of the election of the Republican candidate for president in 1860. He was a member of the Democratic convention at Charleston, 23 April,

W. L. Yancey.

1860, and withdrew with other southern extremists. During the presidential canvass he made a tour through the north and west, speaking at Faneuil hall, Boston, Cooper institute, New York, and elsewhere, urging the rejection of the Republican candidate on the ground that the platform adopted by that party would make the south hopeless of justice on the slavery question. In the Alabama convention, which met at Montgomery, 7 Jan., 1861, he reported the ordinance of secession, which was passed on 14 Jan. On 27 Feb. he was appointed a commissioner to the governments of Europe to obtain a recognition of the Confederate states, and left New York in March. He returned in February, 1862, and was a member of the Confederate senate at Richmond until the time of his death.

YANDELL, Lunsford Pitts, physician, b. in Dixon Springs, Tenn., 4 July, 1805; d. in Louisville, Ky., 4 Feb., 1878. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Maryland in 1825, and in 1826 settled in Murfreesboro', Tenn. In 1830 he removed to Nashville and in 1831 to Lexington, Ky., thence in 1837 to Louisville. He was elected professor of chemistry in Transylvania university in 1831, and in 1837 to the same chair in the medical department of the University of Louisville. In 1849 he was transferred to the chair of physiology and pathological anatomy, and in 1859 became professor of the theory and practice of medicine in Memphis medical college. He held the presidency of the Louisville, Lexington, and Kentucky medical societies, and of the Louisville college of physicians and surgeons. For six years he edited the "Transylvania Journal of Medicine," and in 1840-'56 the "Western Journal of Medicine and Surgery." He was the author of a prize essay on "Fever"; a report on "The Medical Sciences" (1849); one on "American Medical Literature" (1873); also one on the same subject before the International medical congress held in Philadelphia in 1876; and other medical papers and addresses.—His son, David Wendell, physician, b. in Murfreesborough, Tenn., 4 Sept., 1826. He was graduated in medicine at the University of Louisville, Ky., in 1846, was in Europe in 1846-'7, and began practice in Louisville in 1848. He became a professor in the University of Louisville in 1858, and was a medical director in the Confederate army in 1861-'5. Dr. Yandell was elected president of the American medical association in 1871, and appointed professor of surgery in the Indiana medical college in 1874. In 1870 he established the "American Practitioner."

YAÑEZ, Plácido (yahñ'-yayth), Bolivian soldier, b. in Cochabamba about 1820; d. in La Paz, 23 Nov., 1861. He had served from early life in the army, and by his frequent participation in revolutions rose rapidly in rank, being promoted brigadier in 1861 by President José María Acha. Soon he became infamous by his ferocity and the cruel slaughter of the most noteworthy citizens of the republic. During the absence of Gen. Acha from the capital Yañez was the military commandant and minister of war, and on 23 Oct., 1861, under pretext of having discovered a conspiracy against the government, he attacked the defenceless city with his troops, and, driving the principal persons into the square of Loreto, shot down and slowly murdered in cold blood more than fifty, among them Gens. Cordoba and Hermosa. But on 23 Nov. of the same year a popular revolt began, and an infuriated multitude demanded his head. Knowing his peril, he took refuge in the government palace with a few sharpshooters, and, failing to obtain relief from the garrison of the citadel, which fraternized with the populace, he tried to escape over the roofs, but was discovered. Falling from the roof of the palace, he was crushed on the pavement, and his body was torn to pieces by the infuriated people.

YANGUAS, Manuel (yahn'-gooahs), Spanish missionary, b. in Guadalajara in 1620; d. in Caracas, Venezuela, in 1689. He entered the order of St. Francis in Madrid, became professor of literature in the principal convent of his order in that city, and was afterward sent to the missions in Porto Rico. Thence he was ordered by the bishop to found missions in Cumana, where he labored for many years among the Piritu and Cumanagoto Indians, and finally became superior of the convent in Caracas. He wrote "Arte de la Lengua de Cumaná" (Burgos, 1683), and a catechism and sundry religious poems in Cumana dialect. The manuscripts of these latter works were preserved in the convent of St. Francis in Caracas, but lost after the revolution of independence.

YARD, Edward Madison, naval officer, b. in Hunterdon, N. J., 24 Nov., 1809; d. in Trenton, N. J., 2 May, 1889. He entered the navy, became a passed midshipman, 10 June, 1833, was commissioned a lieutenant, 23 Feb., 1838, and during the Mexican war was part of the time executive of the "Dale," and for several months in command. He rendered distinguished services at the capture of Guaymas, in the blockade and other operations on the west coast of Mexico. He was promoted to commander, 14 Sept., 1855, was light-house inspector in 1856-'9, and when the civil war began was assigned to the sloop "Dale" on the blockade, but by act of 21 Dec., 1861, he was placed on the retired list because he was more than sixty-two years of age. His services being no longer available by law, he resigned, 3 May, 1866.

YARROW, Henry Crécy, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 19 Nov., 1840. He studied in Pennsylvania and in Switzerland and was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1861. During the civil war he served as assistant surgeon in the 5th Pennsylvania cavalry, and subsequently he was surgeon and naturalist to the expedition for the exploration of the territory west of the 100th meridian, under Lieut. George M. Wheeler, of the U. S. engineers. Dr. Yarrow is a member of the faculty of the medical department of the Columbian university, and is curator of the department of reptiles in the U. S. National museum in Washington, D. C. He is a member of the Philosophical, Anthropological, Biological, and Geographical societies of Washington, and of other scientific bodies in this country and abroad, to whose proceedings he has contributed papers. Dr. Yarrow was associated with Dr. Elliott Coues in the publication of various papers on the natural history of North Carolina, his latest work giving the results of his experiments with serpent-venom and so-called antidotes. His writings include articles in the annual volumes of the U. S. National museum and the Bureau of ethnology; in part, vol. v., on "Zoölogy," of the "Report upon Geographical and Geological Explorations and Surveys west of the 100th Meridian" (Washington, 1875); and "Study of the Mortuary Customs of the North American Indians" (1881); also the article on venomous serpents in "Handbook of the Medical Sciences" (New York, 1888).

YATES, Abraham, member of the Continental congress, b. in Albany, N. Y., 23 Aug., 1724; d. there, 30 June, 1796. He was an active patriot in the Revolution, and wrote a series of spirited articles under the signature of "Sidney" and other pen-names. He was state senator in 1777 and 1779-'90 of New York, and president of the Provincial congress in 1775-'6, also a member of the Continental congress in 1788-'9. He was receiver of Albany in 1778-'9 and its mayor in 1790-'6.—His grandnephew, Joseph Christopher, governor of New York, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 9 Nov., 1768; d. there, 19 March, 1837, was a son of Christopher Yates (1737-1785), who was a land-surveyor and served during the Revolutionary war as colonel of a regiment of engineers, and was quartermaster-general under Gen. Philip Schuyler. Yates studied and practised law at Schenectady, and was one of the founders of Union college in 1795. He served as mayor of Schenectady in 1798-1808, as state senator in 1806-'7, and as judge of the supreme court in 1808-'22, and was governor of the state of New York in 1823-'5. A county in New York state is named in his honor.—His brother, Andrew, clergyman, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 17 Jan., 1773; d. in Day, N. Y., 14 Oct., 1844, was graduated at Yale in 1793, and then studied theology with John H. Livingston. In 1797 he became professor of Latin and Greek in the first faculty of Union college, which chair he held until 1801. He then accepted the pastorate of the East Hartford Congregational church until 1814, when he returned to Union as professor of mental and moral philosophy. In 1825 he became principal of the Polytechnic at Chittengo, where he continued until 1836. The degree of S. T. D., was conferred upon him by Middlebury in 1814.—Another brother, John Barentse, soldier, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 1 Feb., 1784; d. in Chittengo, N. Y., 11 July, 1836, was graduated at Union in 1802 and studied law with his brother Henry. During the war of 1812 he served under Gen. Wade Hampton on the northern frontier of the state of New York, and later was appointed aide to Gov. Daniel D. Tompkins. Subsequently he was elected as a Democrat to congress, and served from 4 Dec., 1815, till 3 March, 1817. Gov. Tompkins made him senior manager of the "literature lotteries" during the last years of their existence. Through his personal influence in New York and England, he aided largely in the building of the Welland canal, receiving from the Duke of Wellington $10,000 toward the scheme. He was for many years judge of the county of Madison, and its member of the assembly at the time of his death.—Andrew Yates's grandson, John Barentse, engineer, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1833, was graduated at Union in 1852, and served during the civil war as colonel of the 1st Michigan engineers under Gen. William T. Sherman. Subsequently he became a division engineer on the New York state canals.—Another grandson, Austin Andrew, lawyer, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 24 March, 1836, was graduated at Union in 1854. He served during the civil war as captain in the 134th New York volunteers, and subsequently was assistant to Judge-Advocate-General Joseph Holt. In 1868 he was elected district attorney of Schenectady county, and he was judge from 1873 till 1876. He has a large law-practice in Schenectady, and has been twice a member of the New York assembly.—Another grandson, Arthur Reid, naval officer, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 20 Oct., 1838, was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1857, and served during the civil war. He was an aide to Admiral Farragut in the battle of Mobile Bay, and was commended in that officer's report to congress. Since 9 Feb., 1884, he has been captain, and he now has command of the steamer "Pensacola."

YATES, Richard, governor of Illinois, b. in Warsaw, Ky., 18 Jan., 1818; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 27 Nov., 1873. At thirteen years of age he went with his father's family to reside in Springfield, Ill. He was graduated at Illinois college, Jacksonville, in 1838, studied law, and practised his profession in Springfield. From 1842 till 1849 he was a member of the legislature, and in 1850 he was elected to congress. He was the youngest member of the 32d congress, and was re-elected in 1852. In 1860 he was elected governor, and he was chosen again in 1862. Gov. Yates had been an outspoken opponent of slavery, and at the opening of the civil war was very active in raising volunteers. He convened the legislature in extra session on 12 April, 1861, the day after the attack on Fort Sumter, and took military possession of Cairo, garrisoning it with regular troops. In

Gov. Yates's office Gen. Ulysses S. Grant received his first distinct recognition as a soldier in the civil war, being appointed by him mustering officer for the state, and afterward colonel of the 21st Illinois regiment. At the expiration of his term of office as governor he was elected to the U. S. senate, where he served from 1865 till 1871. His death occurred while he was returning from a visit to Arkansas, where he had been examining a railroad as U. S. commissioner.

YATES, Robert, jurist, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 17 March, 1738; d. in Albany, N. Y., 9 Sept., 1801. He received a classical education in New York city, where he also studied law under William Livingston, and, having been admitted to the bar in 1760, established himself in practice in Albany, and soon attained eminence in his profession. He espoused the cause of the colonies from the beginning of the difficulty with Great Britain, and wrote several essays under the signature of "The Rough Hewer," which attracted much attention. He was a member of the New York provincial congress of 1775, 1776, 1777, and in 1776 was chosen one of the council of safety. In August, 1776, he served on the committee that drafted the first constitution of the state, and in the same year became one of the judges of the supreme court, of which he was chief justice from 1790 till 1798. He was a member of the convention that formed the constitution of the United States, whose adoption he opposed in the State convention. Soon after this period he was commissioned to treat with the states of Massachusetts and Connecticut on the subject of territory, and to settle the claims of New York against the state of Vermont. He was noted for his moderation and impartiality as a jurist.—His kinsman, Peter W., member of the Continental congress, b. in Albany, N. Y., was a lawyer by profession, and well known in the courts of Albany both before and after the Revolution. He was a member of the committee on correspondence in 1775, but resigned, having angered his colleagues by a letter ridiculing a public reception that was given to Gen. Philip Schuyler. His popularity was so great that he was re-elected, but he declined to serve. He represented New York in the general congress from 1785 till 1787.—Robert's son, John Van Ness, lawyer, b. in Albany, N. Y., 18 Dec., 1779; d. there, 10 Jan., 1839, was educated for the bar, and engaged in practice at Albany. He was made a master in chancery in 1808, and became involved in a legal contest with Chancellor John Lansing, who had adjudged him guilty of malpractice and contempt of court. Though the full bench of the supreme court sustained the chancellor, the arrest was finally declared illegal by the court of errors; yet a subsequent suit for damages failed, because Lansing had committed the act in the discharge of his judicial functions. Yates was recorder of the city of Albany in 1808 and again in 1811-'16, and in 1818-'26 was secretary of state. He also held other offices, and was appointed by the legislature to add notes and references to the revised laws of New York, performing the task with ability and success. He published also "Select Cases Adjudged in the Courts of the State of New York, Containing the Case of John V. N. Yates and the Case of the Journeymen Cordwainers" (New York, 1811); "A Collection of Pleadings and Practical Precedents, with Notes thereon" (2d ed., 1837); a continuation of Chief-Justice William Smith's "History of the Province of New York" (Albany, 1814); with Joseph W. Moulton, a "History of the State of New York" (1824-'6); and, in conjunction with John L. Tillinghast, a "Treatise on the Principles and Practice, Process, Pleadings, and Entries in Cases of Writs of Error" (2 vols., Albany, 1840).

YATES, William, philanthropist, b. in Sapperton, Burton-on-Trent, England, 13 Nov., 1767; d. in Morris, Otsego co., N. Y., 7 March, 1857. He studied medicine under Sir James Earle and Dr. John Abernethy, was surgeon in St. Bartholomew's hospital, London, and in 1790, having inherited an ample fortune, returned to his home. With the purpose of treating and curing lunatics, he built, at Burton-on-Trent, a house which he conducted for several years at his own expense, where he treated with great success a large number of insane paupers. This benevolent effort cost him about $35,000. He emigrated to Philadelphia in 1799, and immediately on his arrival engaged with great zeal in the dissemination of the knowledge of Dr. Edward Jenner's discovery of vaccination. He purchased an estate in Butternuts, Otsego co., N. Y., and resided there till his death.

YEAMAN, George Helm, lawyer, b. in Hardin county, Ky., 1 Nov., 1829. He was educated at an academy, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1852, and began to practise at Owensborough, Ky. In 1854 he was elected a judge of Daviess county. In 1861 he was chosen a member of the legislature, and in 1862 he recruited a regiment for the National army. The same year he was sent to congress as a Unionist to fill a vacancy, and, being re-elected, he served from 1 Dec., 1862, till 3 March, 1865. In the latter year he was appointed by President Johnson minister to Denmark, which office he held till 7 Nov., 1870, since which time he has practised law in New York. Besides pamphlets on "Naturalization" (1867) and "Privateering" (1868), Mr. Yeaman has published "A Study of Government" (Boston, 1870). He has also written for periodicals on the labor and currency questions.

YEAMANS, Sir John, governor of South Carolina, b. in Bristol, England, about 1605; d. in Barbadoes, W. I., about 1676. He was the son of a cavalier, and, not being in good circumstances, emigrated to Barbadoes and became a planter. In 1663 several residents of that island, not being satisfied with their condition, and desiring to establish a colony of their own, sent a vessel to examine the country extending from the 36th degree of north latitude to the river San Mateo, which had already been erected into a territory in London under the name of Carolina. The report being favorable, the planters purchased of the Indians a tract of land thirty-two miles square on Cape Fear river, and begged of the proprietaries a confirmation of the purchase and a separate charter of government. Not all their request was granted, but Sir John was appointed their governor, with a jurisdiction that extended from Cape Fear to San Mateo. The country was called "Clarendon." In the autumn of 1665 he arrived from Barbadoes with a band of emigrants and founded a town on the south bank of Cape Fear river that proved so utter a failure that even its site is now in dispute. Yet the settlement flourished for a time, and exported boards, staves, and shingles to the parent colony. The traffic proved profitable, emigration increased, and in 1666 the plantation is said to have contained 800 souls. Yeamans seems to have managed affairs satisfactorily, but after a time he returned to the West Indies. In 1670 three ship-loads of emigrants that had arrived from England sailed up Ashley river and began a town on "the first high land convenient for tillage and pasturing." In the copy of the original fundamental constitutions given them before leaving London, John Lock, Sir John Yeamans, and James Carteret were created landgraves. The following year the colony was increased by Dutch emigrants from New York and others from Holland, and by the arrival of Sir John from Barbadoes with African slaves, the first that were landed on this continent. The governor soon sunk under the climate and the hardships to which all the settlers were exposed, and Sir John Yeamans was appointed his successor. He proved, however, to be "a sordid calculator," bent only on acquiring a fortune. He encouraged expense, and enriched himself, but without gaining either respect or hatred. The proprietaries complained that "it must be a bad soil" if industrious men could not get a living out of it, and protested that they did not propose to maintain the idle. In 1674 Yeamans was removed from office, and at once sailed for Barbadoes, where he soon afterward died.

YEARDLEY, Sir George, governor of Virginia, b. in England about 1580; d. there in November, 1627. He was among the early emigrants to Virginia, and on the return of Sir Thomas Dale to England in 1616, was appointed deputy governor by that official. The appointment did not please the friends of Sir Thomas Smythe, the chairman of the London company, and they succeeded in electing in his stead Samuel Argall, who had made several voyages to Virginia as Smythe's trading agent. Argall arrived in the colony in 1617, and proving himself from the first "arrogant, self-willed, and greedy of gain," he was displaced after the death of Lord Delaware, and the "mild and popular" Yeardley was re-elected governor. On 22 Nov. the king gave Yeardley audience, knighted him, and held a long conversation with him on the religion of the natives. On 19 April, 1619, Sir George entered on his office. From the moment of his arrival dates the real life of Virginia. Commissions and instructions from the company "for the better establishing of a commonwealth" were brought over by him, in accordance with which he made proclamation that the cruel laws by which the planters had so long been governed were now abrogated. It was also "graunted that a generall assemblie shoulde be helde yearly once." Yeardley remained in office until 1621, but, not proving as energetic as the company in London desired that he should be, he was superseded by Sir Francis Wyatt, who was the bearer of a written constitution for the colony. A year after the accession of Charles I. Wyatt retired, and Yeardley was again made governor, his appointment being considered a guarantee that representative government would be maintained as it had been introduced by him. From this time Virginia rose rapidly in public esteem; in 1627, 1,000 emigrants arrived, and there was an increasing demand for the products of the soil. In November of that year Yeardley's career was closed by death. Posterity retains a grateful recollection of the man who first convened a representative assembly in the western hemisphere, while the colonists, in a letter to the privy council, pronounced a glowing eulogy on his character.

YEATES, Jasper, merchant, b. in Yorkshire, England; d. near New Castle, Del., in 1720. He emigrated to the West Indies, and afterward removed to Chester, Pa., where he built and resided in a venerable mansion that is still standing, and was afterward Mrs. Deborah Logan's. He also erected extensive granaries on the creek. In 1701 he was constituted by William Penn one of the four burgesses of Chester, and in 1703 was elected chief Burgess. In 1694 he was appointed justice of the court for Chester county, and from 1704 till 1710 and from 1717 till his death he was associate-justice of the supreme courts of the province of Pennsylvania and the lower counties on the Delaware. In 1696 he was admitted to a seat in the provincial council of Pennsylvania. In 1700 he was elected a representative of New Castle county in the general assembly of the province, and, after the separation of the lower counties on the Delaware, was chosen a representative and speaker of their assembly.—His grandson, Jasper, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 April, 1745; d. in Lancaster, Pa., 14 March, 1817, was graduated at the College of Philadelphia in 1761, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1765, and in 1774 was chosen a member of the Lancaster county committee of correspondence, of which he became chairman in 1776. Fourteen years afterward he sat in the convention that ratified the constitution of the United States. From 1791 until his death he was an associate justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. In 1794 President Washington appointed him a commissioner to confer with the inhabitants of the western counties of Pennsylvania, for the settlement of the whisky insurrection. Judge Yeates preserved notes of judicial proceedings in which he took part, and prepared them for the press. They were issued, after his death, as "Reports of Cases Adjudged in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, with some Select Cases at Nisi Prius, and in the Circuit Courts, from 1791 till 1808" (4 vols., Philadelphia, 1817-'19).—His daughter, Catharine, benefactor, b. in Lancaster, Pa., in 1783; d. there, 7 June, 1866, devoted a legacy of $26,000 to founding the Yeates institute for the education of young men for the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, and also contributed to its maintenance the sum of $800 yearly.

YELL, Archibald, lawyer, b. in Kentucky in 1797; d. in Buena Vista, Mexico, 23 Feb., 1847. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, removed to the territory of Arkansas, settled at Fayetteville, and was appointed one of the U. S. territorial judges. He was elected to the 24th congress, re-elected to the 25th, and served from 5 Dec., 1836, till 3 March, 1839. He was subsequently chosen governor of Arkansas, and held the office from 1840 till 1844. The following year he was again elected to congress, and he served from 1 Dec., 1845, till 1 July, 1846, when he resigned to join the army in Mexico. He was mustered into the service as colonel of the 1st Arkansas volunteer cavalry, and was killed by a Mexican lancer while leading his men at the battle of Buena Vista.

YELLAND, Raymond D., artist, b. in London, England, 2 Feb., 1848. He came to this country, studied at the National academy and under James R. Brevoort and William Page in 1869-'71, and under Luc, Olivier Merson, in Paris, in 1886-'7. He was elected a member of the San Francisco art association in 1874, and during 1877-'8 was assistant director of the California school of design, of which he was elected director in 1888. Among his works are "Half-Moon Beach," "The Lonely Sea," "Sunlight and Shadow," "The Golden Gate at Even," "Mount Tacoma," "Mount Hood," "Columbia River," "Golden Gate," "Near Dordrecht," and "Faringford, Isle of Wight."

YEO, James, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Porthill, Prince Edward island, 31 Oct., 1832. He is the son of James, who came from Devonshire, England, in 1827, and who was a member of the Prince Edward island assembly for thirty years. The son is a merchant, ship-builder, and ship-owner; was a representative in the Prince Edward island assembly and a member of the executive council for several years previous to 1872, when the province entered the confederation. He was elected to the Dominion parliament in 1872, and re-elected in 1874, 1878, 1882, and 1887.

YEO, Sir James Lucas, British naval officer, b. in Southampton, England, in 1782; d. off the coast of Africa in 1819. He entered the navy at an early age under Admiral Cosby. In 1797 he was promoted lieutenant, and assigned to "La Loire," under Capt. Frederick L. Maitland. While off the Spanish coast he was sent to capture the enemy's vessels in the port of El Muros. Storming the fort, he succeeded in bringing out of the port every vessel, armed and unarmed. For this achievement he was made commander, and given the "Confiance," one of the vessels he had taken. In 1809 he captured Cayenne, in conjunction with the Portuguese, and was in consequence made post-captain, and received from the prince regent of Portugal a knight's commandery of St. Benito d'Avis, being the only Protestant ever so honored. Sir James was placed in command of the British naval forces on Lake Ontario, and on 27 May, 1813, appeared off Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., on the "Wolf," twenty-four guns, with a squadron of five war-vessels, and about forty bateaux, containing 1,200 troops under command of Sir George Prevost. In May, 1814, he again sailed out of Kingston harbor with an effective force of cruising-vessels, and 1,000 troops under Gen. Sir George Gordon Drummond. The capture of Oswego was the first fruits of the expedition. Subsequently he was blockaded for six weeks in Kingston harbor by Capt. Isaac Chauncey, of the American navy, who had previously defeated him and his squadron in York bay. On 15 Oct. Sir James once more sailed, on board the "St. Lawrence," pierced for 112 guns, and carrying over a thousand men, accompanied by four ships, two brigs, and a schooner, and henceforth was "lord of the lake." He did not deem it prudent, however, to attack Capt. Chauncey, who had retired to Sackett's Harbor, where a force of 6,000 men had been gathered. The lake being closed soon afterward by ice, no further hostilities followed, as the treaty of peace was signed in the following December. After the return of Sir James to England he was ordered to duty off the west coast of Africa. His health having been already impaired by arduous service, he was unable to withstand the climate, and died while on the voyage home.

YEOMANS, John William, clergyman, b. in Hinsdale, Berkshire co., Mass., 7 Jan., 1800; d. in Danville, Montour co., Pa., 22 June, 1863. He was graduated at Williams in 1824, and, after holding the office of tutor there for a year, resigned to study theology at Andover seminary. In 1828 he was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian church at North Adams, Mass., where he remained until 1832, when he took charge of the 1st Congregational church at Pittsfield, Mass., whence he was called in 1834 to the 1st Presbyterian church at Trenton, N. J. In 1841 he became president of Lafayette college, Easton, Pa., but he resigned in 1845 to become pastor of the Mahoning church at Danville, Pa., where he remained until his death. In 1860 he was moderator of the General assembly of the Presbyterian church. As president of Lafayette, Dr. Yeomans proved himself a ripe scholar and an able teacher. He was regarded as one of the chief theologians of his denomination, and as a metaphysician probably had but few equals among his contemporaries. He received the degree of D. D. from Miami university in 1841. Among his publications are "Election Sermon" (Boston, 1834); "Dedication Sermon" (Trenton, 1840); and "Address on the Author's Inauguration as President of Lafayette College" (Easton, 1841). He was also a frequent contributor to the "Princeton Review," and was co-author of a "History of the County of Berkshire, Mass., in Two Parts" (Pittsfield, 1829).—His son, Edward Dorr, clergyman, b. in North Adams, Berkshire co., Mass., 27 Sept., 1829; d. in Orange, Essex co., N. J., 25 Aug., 1868, was educated chiefly by his father, and passed through the Junior year at Lafayette college before he was fifteen years old. On account of his youth he was not graduated, but he received from Princeton the honorary degree of A. M. in 1849 and that of D. D. in 1864. After studying theology at Princeton, he was licensed to preach, 21 April, 1847, when only seventeen years and a half old. After preaching from 1847 till 1849 at New Columbia, Pa., and serving as principal of an academy at Danville, Pa., in 1847-'50, he was pastor successively of several churches, including Rochester, N. Y., from 1847 until his death. That event was supposed to have been hastened by his energetic work at Orange, which resulted in doubling the church membership within a year, while he was undergoing the strain of severe literary labor. Dr. Yeomans will probably be longest remembered as a translator from the German. His English versions of Dr. Philip Schaff's "History of the Apostolic Church" (New York, 1853), of "Lectures on America" (1855), and "History of the Christian Church" (1859), have the idiomatic character of original compositions. He was engaged at the time of his death in translating the large volume of Lange's "Commentary on John."

YERGER, George Shall, lawyer, b. in Hagerstown, Md., 23 Aug., 1801; d. in Bolivar county, Miss., 20 April, 1860. His father, who was of German origin, emigrated to the neighborhood of Lebanon, Tenn., in 1816. There George obtained a fair education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He settled in Nashville, was for many years reporter of the decisions of the supreme court of Tennessee, and was elected attorney-general of the state. After attaining a wide reputation he removed to Vicksburg, Miss., in 1839, and took rank among the chief lawyers of that locality. In 1844 he changed his residence to Jackson, Miss., where he practised his profession until his death. In the latter city he appeared chiefly in the high court, confining himself to cases arising out of the violations of commercial law, and the discussion of questions of equity. An exception to this rule was his defence of Gen. Daniel Adams, who killed his antagonist in a personal encounter in the streets of Vicksburg in 1844. In politics Mr. Yerger was a staunch advocate of the principles of the Whig party, and in the canvasses of 1840-'4 took an active part in support of its candidates for the presidency, but never sought nor filled any public office. While engaged in a deer-hunt, Mr. Yerger shot a large buck, and had just run up to secure him, when he fell dead, from heart-disease, upon the dying stag. He published "Reports of Cases Argued and Determined in the Supreme Court of Tennessee, December, 1818, to December, 1837" (10 vols., Nashville, 1832-'8).

YEWELL, George Henry, artist, b. in Havre de Grace, Md., 20 Jan., 1830. He studied at the National academy and under Thomas Hicks, and in 1856 became the pupil of Thomas Couture in Paris. During 1867-'78 he lived in Italy, excepting one winter spent in Egypt. His works include "Children on the Sea-Shore" (1861); "The Wounded Drummer-Boy"; "Roman Shepherd-Boy"; some Venetian subjects, including interior views of the Church of St. Mark; "Santa Maria della Salute" (Louisville art-gallery); "In the Church of San Pietro, Perugia" (1877); and "In the Carpet Bazaar, Cairo," and "Mosque of Kait-Bey, Cairo" (1878). He has of late been engaged principally on portraits, among which are those of Isaac Davis, Alexander Mitchell, Frederick Layton (Layton art-gallery, Milwaukee), John Chambers and Ralph P. Lowe (capitol at Des Moines, Iowa), Robert Lucas, and Charles Mason, his earliest patron, through whose aid he began his art studies. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1862, and an academician in 1880.

YOAKUM, Henderson K., lawyer, b. in Claiborne county, Tenn., in 1810; d. in Houston, Tex., 29 Nov., 1856. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1832, brevetted 2d lieutenant, and served in the Black Hawk expedition the same year, but was not at the seat of war. He resigned from the army, 31 March, 1833, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Tennessee from 1835 till 1845. In 1839 he was elected a member of the state senate. He removed to Texas in 1845, and continued to practise his profession at Huntsville from 1846 till 1856. From June till September of the former year he served in the Mexican war as 1st lieutenant of Texas mounted rifle volunteers. In 1850-'6 he was colonel of Texas militia. Col. Yoakum was a contributor to various periodicals, and published "A History of Texas from its First Settlement under La Salle in 1685 to its Annexation to the United States in 1845" (New York, 1855).

YODER, Jacob, pioneer, b. in Reading, Pa., 11 Aug., 1758; d. in Spencer county, Ky., 7 April, 1832. He was of Swiss descent. After serving through the Revolutionary war in the Pennsylvania line, he built a large boat at Fort Red Stone (now Brownsville), on Monongahela river, which he freighted with flour and carried to New Orleans in May, 1782. With the profits of this venture he bought peltries which he sold in Havana, investing the proceeds in sugar for the Philadelphia market. This was the first attempt to navigate the Ohio and Mississippi rivers for commercial purposes. Subsequently he settled in Spencer county, Ky., and took part in equipping and keeping in the field the military forces in the northwest territory.

YOU, Dominique, soldier, b. in Hayti in 1775; d. in New Orleans, La., in 1830. Little is known of his early life, but he is supposed to have followed the sea at first. Subsequently he served in the artillery corps during the wars of the French republic, and in 1802 accompanied Gen. Victor Leclerc to Santo Domingo. Afterward he found his way to New Orleans, where he was employed by the brothers Jean and Pierre Lafitte, and soon became the pirates' principal captain. He was nicknamed "Captain Dominique" by the French and "Johnness" by the Americans, and won reputation for boldness and daring. When Venezuela declared her independence, Capt. Dominique procured letters of marque from the patriots and did much damage to Spanish commerce in the Gulf of Mexico. During the following years he took part in the unlawful operations of the Lafittes in the bayous, and in July, 1814, was indicted by a grand jury for piracies in the Gulf; but could not be apprehended. At the subsequent raid on the pirates' establishments in Barataria he escaped to the swamps of the interior; but when the English invaded Louisiana he offered his services to the American authorities, and was appointed commander of a company of artillery, which he formed with the best gunners of the pirates' ships and which did such good service in the battle of New Orleans, 8 Jan., 1815, that they were mentioned in Gen. Andrew Jackson's general order of 21 Jan. as "having shown uncommon gallantry and skill in the field." On the strength of this, all proceedings against Dominique You were dropped, and he settled quietly in New Orleans, where he enjoyed great popularity as a politician and afterward strongly supported Gen. Jackson. You's example did much to pacify Louisiana and secure the good-will of the lawless population, and when he died he was given a military funeral at the public expense. See Charles Gayarré's "Histoire de la Louisiane" (New Orleans, 1847).

YOUMANS, Edward Livingston, scientist, b. in Coeymans, N. Y., 3 June, 1821; d. in New York city, 18 Jan., 1887. In childhood his parents removed to Saratoga county, where his youth was passed. He attended the common school, and was an insatiable reader, but at thirteen years of age was attacked with ophthalmia. In 1840 he went to New York for treatment, and the city became his home. His blindness lasted several years, but he finally recovered partially. During these years of suffering and deprivation he was a constant worker and an assiduous student of books and events. He studied elementary chemistry and physics with the aid of his sister, and when he was left to himself his leisure was spent in writing with a pocket-machine of his own contrivance. In 1851, while studying agricultural chemistry, he prepared a chemical chart that made clear by means of colored diagrams the laws of chemical science as they were then expounded (revised and enlarged, 1856). He studied medicine during this period and received the degree of M. D. from the University of Vermont. In 1852 he began to lecture upon science, and for the next seventeen years he gave courses of lectures in connection with the lyceum system in many towns and cities, awakening deep interest in scientific subjects. In his lectures on the "Chemistry of the Sunbeam" and the "Dynamics of Life" he was the first to expound popularly the doctrines of the conservation of energy and the mutual relation of forces. He early became deeply interested in the diffusion in this country of standard scientific works, and particularly those bearing upon the evolution philosophy, procuring their republication here, and doing all he could through the newspaper and periodical press to make them known to the public. Herbert Spencer's books alone, in behalf of which he spared no effort, have reached a sale of 132,000 copies, and the foreign authors, whose works were in his charge, have for years enjoyed, by voluntary arrangement with the Messrs. Appleton, the benefits of international copyright, of the justice and need of which Mr. Youmans was from the beginning of his literary life an ardent advocate. The "International Scientific Series" was planned by him in 1871, and arrangements were made for the publication of the works in New York, London, Paris, and Leipzig, and afterward in St. Petersburg and Milan. The project was based on the idea of payment to authors from the sale in all countries. The series has reached (1888) its sixty-fourth volume. In 1872 he established the "Popular Science Monthly," and thenceforward the editorial duties of the magazine absorbed his chief attention. The twenty-eight volumes issued under his care show the same devotion to the spread of scientific thought upon the chief topics of the time. His enthusiastic nature led to constant overdoing, and the strain told upon his strength years before his death. From 1882 his lungs were seriously affected, but he worked on persistently until early in 1886. He published "Alcohol and the Constitution of Man" (New York, 1853); "The Chemical Atlas," an extension of method of the chemical chart that has been mentioned (1854); "Handbook of Household Science" (1857); "The Correlation and Conservation of Forces," a compilation with an able introduction setting forth America's contribution to the modern doctrine of forces (1864); and "The Culture demanded by Modern Life," a compilation from various authors, presenting the claims of their special sciences as suited for the best culture (1868). His introduction to the volume is perhaps his most finished literary work. He also contributed to the body of the book an original lecture given in London on "The Scientific Study of Human Nature."—His brother, William Jay, editor, b. in Saratoga, N. Y., 14 Oct., 1838, worked on his father's farm and attended the district-school until his seventeenth year. He studied chemistry under his brother, and in the Yale scientific school, and natural history under Dr. Asa Fitch, was graduated at the medical department of the New York university in 1865, and then went abroad in the same year to continue his studies in natural history under Prof. Thomas H. Huxley. He practised medicine three years in Minnesota, but abandoned it to assist in establishing the "Popular Science Monthly," the management of which he shared until the death of his brother, when he became its sole editor. He has contributed occasionally to its pages under his own name, and for many years has prepared the articles on chemistry, metallurgy, and physiology for Appletons' "Annual Cyclopædia." He is a member of several scientific associations. He has edited Huxley's "Lessons in Elementary Physiology," to which he added a second part on "Elementary Hygiene" (New York, 1867).—Their sister, Eliza Ann, author, b. in Saratoga, N. Y., 17 Dec., 1826, became interested in the scientific studies which she aided her brother to pursue, and her fondness for children led her to apply them to early education. She has published "First Book of Botany, designed to Cultivate the Observing Powers of Children" (New York, 1870) and "Second Book of Botany" (1873). These were intended to promote the systematic study of plants as objects in place of the object lessons in general use. She has prepared an enlarged edition of Henslow's "Botanical Charts" (1873), translated from the French Quatrefage's "Natural History of Man" (1875), and contributed to the "Popular Science Monthly" and other periodicals. Miss Youmans also published "Descriptive Botany, a Guide to the Classification of Plants, with a Popular Flora" (1885), and an abridgment of Bently's "Physiological Botany," as a sequel (1886).

YOUMANS, Letitia Creighton, Canadian reformer, b. in Cobourg, Ont., in 1827. She was educated at the Cobourg ladies' academy and at Burlington academy, Hamilton, and was for a short time teacher in a ladies' academy at Pictou. In 1850 she married Arthur Youmans, and soon afterward she became well known as a lecturer on temperance. She was superintendent of the juvenile work of the Good Templar organization and a member of the editorial staff of the "Temperance Union," organized a Women's Christian temperance union in Toronto, and was president of the Ontario temperance union from 1878 till 1883, when she became president of the Dominion organization. She was re-elected in 1885. Mrs. Youmans was one of the Canadian delegates to the World's temperance congress at Philadelphia in 1876, and in May, 1882, visited the British women's temperance association at London, and afterward lectured in various parts of England, Ireland, and Scotland. She is also well known as a lecturer on temperance throughout this country.

YOUNG, Alexander, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 22 Sept., 1800; d. there, 16 March, 1854. He was the son of Alexander Young, a printer, who, with Samuel Etherege, established the "Massachusetts Chronicle," afterward also called the "New England Palladium," an organ of the Federalist party. He was graduated at Harvard in 1820 and at the divinity-school in 1824. On leaving college he taught a year in the Boston Latin-school, where he had been a pupil, and in 1825 was ordained pastor of the New South Unitarian church in Boston, which office he held until his death. He was also a member of the board of overseers of Harvard from 1837 till 1853, and secretary from 1849 till 1853, and corresponding secretary of the Massachusetts historical society from 1849 till 1854. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1846. He was noted for his felicity in the delineation of character, and his discourses in memory of distinguished citizens of Massachusetts ran through several editions and were widely circulated. Of these the most notable were the discourses on Nathaniel Bowditch (Boston, 1838), President John T. Kirkland, of Harvard (1840), and Judge William Prescott, father of the historian (1844). Dr. Young also rendered essential service to American history by the publication of "Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers of the Colony of Plymouth from 1602 to 1625" (Boston, 1841) and "Chronicles of the First Planters of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay from 1623 to 1636" (1846). He also edited "Library of Old English Prose Writers," the first publication of the kind in this country (9 vols., 1831-'4). There is a memoir of Dr. Young by Rev. Chandler Robbins, D. D., published in the "Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society."—His son, Alexander, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 19 May, 1836, was educated in the Boston public schools, and for several years engaged in mercantile pursuits. In 1862 he was graduated at the Harvard law-school, and at once began the practice of law in Boston. He also became associate editor of the "Globe" of that city soon after its establishment in 1872. He has been a frequent contributor to periodical literature, and is now editorially connected with the Boston "Post." His "History of the Netherlands" (Boston, 1884; London, 1886) is based on original authorities, important additions having been made to the period that is covered by Motley's works, and the history brought down to the present time.

YOUNG, Alfred, clergyman, b. in Bristol, England, 21 Jan., 1831. He was graduated at Princeton in 1848, and at the medical department of the University of New York in 1852, after which he practised medicine for a year. In 1850 he became a convert to the Roman Catholic faith, and after ecclesiastical studies at the Seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris, France, he was ordained a priest of that church on 24 Aug., 1856. He was vice-president of Seton Hall college in 1856-'7, rector of the Roman Catholic church in Princeton, N. J., in 1857-'60, and of the church in Trenton, N. J., in 1860-'1. Father Young then entered the community of the Paulists in New York city. His name has been particularly associated with the reformation of church music, and the beginning in the United States of an effort toward the restoration of the Gregorian chant for the entire services of his church. This practice was introduced in the Paulist church in 1870, and has since continued to be a feature in its services. He has both written and lectured in favor of it, and it is being gradually adopted elsewhere. At present he is engaged in the advocacy of a further reform tending toward congregational singing. Besides magazine articles on sundry religious topics, and a series of epigrammatic poems on scriptural texts in the "Catholic World," he has published "The Complete Sodality Hymn-Book" (New York, 1863); new ed., entitled "Catholic Hymns and Canticles" (1888); "The Office of Vespers" (1869); "The Catholic Hymnal" (1884); and "Carols for a Merry Christmas and a Joyous Easter" (2 vols., 1885-'6).—His brother, EDWARD (1818-1870), was a jeweler, and published in 1859 "The Ladye Lillian and other Poems."

YOUNG, Sir Allen William, British explorer, b. in Twickenham, Middlesex, England, in 1830. He was a captain in the merchant service at the time of the Crimean war, and rendered useful service as master of a transport to the British forces at Balaklava. Afterward he volunteered for the Franklin search expedition of Capt. Francis L. McClintock, in 1857-'60, and was sailing-master of the "Fox" during the voyage. In command of a sledge party, between February and July, 1859, he discovered 400 miles of new coast. In 1862 he commanded an expedition to survey a route for a cable telegraph under the Atlantic ocean by way of Iceland and Greenland. He was one of the organizers of the Chinese navy, and captain of a man-of-war during the Taiping rebellion. In 1875 he attempted the northwest passage, and endeavored to find the records of the lost Franklin expedition on King William's Land, in his yacht "Pandora"; and in 1876 he refitted her for a second voyage with the same object, but changed his destination to Smith sound at the request of the British admiralty, which desired to communicate with the depots of the government expedition. He accomplished his mission with success, and for his services was knighted, 12 March, 1877. An account of the "Two Voyages of the 'Pandora' in 1875 and 1876" has been published (London, 1879).

YOUNG, Andrew White, author, b. in Carlisle, Schoharie co., N. Y., 2 March, 1802; d. in Warsaw, Wyoming co., N. Y., 17 Feb., 1877. He removed to Warsaw in 1816, received a common-school education, taught for several years, then engaged in mercantile business, and in 1830 established the Warsaw "Sentinel," changing the name in 1832 to the "Republican Advocate." In 1836 he published and edited a paper called the "American Citizen." Mr. Young represented Wyoming county in the legislature in 1845-'6 and in the Constitutional convention of 1846. He published "Introduction to the Science of Government," which obtained an extensive circulation (Warsaw, 1835; revised ed., 1839); "First Lessons in Civil Government" (1843; revised ed., 1847); "Citizen's Manual of Government and Law" (1851; revised ed., 1858); "The American Statesman: a Political History of the United States" (1855; new ed., with an appendix written just before his death, New York, 1888); and "National Economy: a History of the American Protective System" (1860).

YOUNG, Sir Aretas William, British soldier, b. about 1778; d. 1 Dec., 1835. He entered the army in 1795 as ensign, was captain in the 13th foot in 1796, and served in Ireland during the rebellion of 1798. In 1801 he was on duty in Egypt, and in 1807 he was advanced to the rank of major in the 47th regiment. Subsequently he was engaged in many battles of the Peninsular war, and from 1813 he served in the West Indies as lieutenant-colonel, chiefly at Trinidad. In 1815 he was sent to join the expedition against Guadaloupe, and received one of the badges of the Order of Merit from Louis XVIII. He was next placed in command of the troops in Grenada, and, on his being ordered back to Trinidad, the council of assembly presented him with a sword valued at 100 guineas. From this time to the final disbandment of the 3d West Indian regiment in 1825, he administered the government at various times during the absence of Sir Ralph Woodford, and was rewarded for the "candor, integrity, and impartiality which had marked his administration" by 150 guineas for a sword, and plate valued at £250. In 1826 he was appointed protector of slaves in Demerara, and in 1831 was made lieutenant-governor of Prince Edward island. In 1834 he was knighted.

YOUNG, Augustus, author, b. in Arlington, Vt., 20 March, 1785; d. in St. Albans, Vt., 17 June, 1857. He received an academic education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and began practice at Stow. In 1812 he removed to Crafts-bury. He was a member of the state assembly during twelve successive sessions and of the state senate for three terms, and was state's attorney for Orleans county and judge of probate. He was a member of congress from Vermont from 31 May, 1841, till 3 March, 1843, and declined a re-election. He then resumed the practice of law, removed to St. Albans in 1847, was for several years judge of the county court there, and in 1856 was appointed state naturalist. He published "On the Quadrature of the Circle" (St. Albans, 1852) and "Preliminary Report on the Natural History of the State of Vermont" (Burlington, 1856).

YOUNG, Brigham, president of the Mormon church, b. in Whitingham, Vt., 1 June, 1801; d. in Salt Lake City, 29 Aug., 1877. His father, John, a farmer, served in the Revolutionary war. In 1804 Brigham went with his parents to Sherburne, N.

Brigham Young

Y., where, until he was sixteen, he received only eleven days' schooling. He then engaged in business and was a carpenter, joiner, painter, and glazier in Mendon, N. Y. In 1830 he first saw the "Book of Mormon," and a year later he was converted by Samuel H. Smith, the "prophet's" brother. On 14 April, 1832, he was baptized and began to preach in the vicinity of Mendon. In the autumn of 1832 he went to Kirtland, Ohio, where he became the close friend of Joseph Smith. He was ordained an elder, and in the winter of 1832-'3 was engaged in Canada, preaching, baptizing, and organizing missions. His advancement in the church was rapid, and on 14 Feb., 1835, he was chosen one of the twelve apostles, becoming their president a year later. Meanwhile much of his time was spent in Kirtland, where he was occupied in working on the Temple and in studying Hebrew, also in travelling, preaching, and making converts. During 1836-'7 an effort was made to depose the prophet Joseph and appoint David Whitmer president of the church. A council was held for this purpose, at which Young made an earnest plea for Smith, and the meeting terminated unpleasantly. On 22 Dec., 1837, Brigham Young left Kirtland. He purchased land in Far West, Mo., in 1838, and settled there; but, in pursuance of the order of Gov. Lilburn W. Boggs, he and his family left their home and much of their personal property on 14 Feb., 1839, and returned to Quincy, Ill. Later he was one of the twelve that founded Nauvoo, and in September of that year set out on a mission to England. His experience there is given in his own words: "We landed in the spring of 1840 as strangers in a strange land and penniless, but through the mercy of God we have printed . . . 5,000 'Books of Mormon,' 3,000 hymn-books, 2,500 volumes of the 'Millennial Star,' and 50,000 tracts, . . . emigrated to Zion 1,000 souls, yet we have lacked nothing to eat, drink, or wear." The death of Joseph and Hyrum Smith in Carthage jail was announced to him by letter while he was on a mission in Peterborough, N. H., and he returned to Nauvoo on 6 Aug. Sidney Rigdon was then claiming leadership in the church, but two days later Young was chosen successor to Smith. In the autumn the people of Hancock and adjacent counties clamored for the removal of the Mormons from the state. In reply to such a demand, Young said, on 1 Oct., 1845, that it was the intention of from 5,000 to 6,000 persons to leave Nauvoo early in 1846 to seek a home in the wilderness. Subsequently the charter of Nauvoo was revoked, and the Mormons suffered house-burnings, plunderings, whippings, murders, and the fury of mob violence. In pursuance of his promise, many of the Mormons crossed Mississippi river early in February, 1846, and on the 15th of that month President Young and his family set out. On 1 March, while there was still several inches of snow on the ground, the exodus began with about 400 wagons in line. Brigham Young was chosen president in "Camp of Israel" on 27 March, and captains of hundreds, of fifties, and of tens were appointed to conduct the march. By command of Col. Stephen W. Kearny, a call was made on President Young, on 26 June, 1846, to furnish 500 men for one year's service during the Mexican war. "You shall have your battalion at once," he replied, and the quota of what was known as "the Mormon battalion" was filled within three days. On their arrival near what is now Florence, Neb., on 21 July, the Omaha and Pottawattamie Indians received them kindly, and urged the fugitives to establish a camp in their midst. President Young accepted this offer, after obtaining the consent of President Polk, and made his winter-quarters there. They laid the settlement out in streets and blocks, on which comfortable log-houses were built and a grist-mill was erected. On 7 April, 1847, Young, with 142 men, set out in search of a suitable place for a settlement. They entered Salt Lake valley on 24 July, 1847, and, after a survey had been made of the locality and the first house erected, Young returned to winter-quarters on 31 Oct., 1847, and on 5 Dec. was elected president by the "twelve apostles," with Heber C. Kimball and Willard Richards as counsellors. On 26 May, 1848, he set out again, accompanied by his family and 2,000 followers, for Salt Lake City, and arrived there on 20 Sept. A provisional government being requisite until congress should otherwise provide, he was elected on 12 March, 1849, governor of "Deseret," which is understood by the Mormons to signify "the land of the honey-bee." The territory of Utah was established on 9 Sept., 1850, and on 3 Feb., 1851, Young took the oath of office as its governor, commander-in-chief of the militia, and superintendent of Indian affairs, to which places he had been appointed by President Fillmore. Under his administration extensive tracts of land were brought under cultivation and large numbers of converts were brought from Europe. On 29 Aug., 1852, the doctrine of polygamy was first announced as a tenet of the Mormon church by Brigham Young. He claimed that a revelation commanding it had been made to Joseph Smith; but the widow and four sons of Smith denied ever having seen or heard of any such revelation. Polygamy is strictly forbidden in the "Book of Mormon," the "Doctrine and Covenants," and all Mormon publications that were issued before Smith's death, and many left the church on this question. Subsequently they formed an independent organization under the leadership of one of the sons of Smith. To sustain the new dogma, papers and periodicals were established in various parts of the world. Meanwhile the Federal judges were forced by threats of violence to leave Utah, and the laws of the United States were defied and subverted as early as 1850. Col. Edward J. Steptoe was sent in 1854 to Utah as governor, with a battalion of soldiers; but he did not deem it prudent to assume the office, and, after wintering in Salt Lake City, he formally resigned his post and went with his command to California. Most of the civil officers that were commissioned about the same time with Col. Steptoe arrived in Utah a few months after he had departed, and were harassed and terrified like their predecessors. In February, 1856, a mob of armed Mormons, instigated by sermons from the heads of the church, broke into the court-room of the U. S. district judge and compelled him to adjourn his court. Soon afterward all the U. S. officers, with the exception of the Indian agent, were forced to flee from the territory. These and other outrages determined President Buchanan to supersede Brigham Young in the office of governor, and to send to Utah a military force to protect the Federal officers. (See CUMMING, ALFRED, and JOHNSTON, ALBERT SIDNEY.) The affair terminated with the acceptance of a pardon by the Mormons, who on their part promised to submit to the Federal authority. Throughout his life Young encouraged agriculture and manufactures, the opening of roads and the construction of bridges and public edifices, and pursued a conciliatory policy with the Indians. He successfully completed a contract to grade more than 100 miles of the Union Pacific railroad, was the prime mover in the construction of the Utah Central railroad, aided in building the Utah Northern and Utah Western narrow-gauge roads, introduced and fostered co-operation in all branches of business, and extended telegraph-wires to most of the towns of Utah. Young took to himself a large number of wives, most of whom resided in a building that was known as the "Lion house," from a huge lion carved in stone that stands upon the portico. In 1871 he was indicted for polygamy but not convicted. At the time of his death he left seventeen wives, sixteen sons, and twenty-eight daughters, and had been the father of fifty-six children. Besides his office of president of the church, Young was grand archer of the order of Danites, a secret organization within the church, which was one of the chief sources of his absolute power, and whose members, it is claimed, committed many murders and other outrages by his orders. By organizing and directing the trade and industry of the community, he accumulated great wealth. His funeral was celebrated with impressive ceremonies, in which more than 30,000 persons participated. YOUNG, Charles Augustus, astronomer, b. in Hanover, N. H., 15 Dec., 1834. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1853, and then taught classics at Phillips Andover academy for three years, during one year of which he studied at the theological seminary. In 1856 he was called to fill the chair of mathematics, natural philosophy, and astronomy at Western reserve college, Ohio. During the civil war he was captain of a company in the 85th Ohio volunteers for three months in 1862. He was chosen professor of natural philosophy and astronomy at Dartmouth in 1865, which post had been held by his father, Ira Young, in 1838-58, and remained there until 1877, when he accepted the chair of astronomy at Princeton. Prof. Young was a member of the astronomical party that was sent to observe the total solar eclipse of 7 Aug., 1869, at Burlington, Iowa, and was given charge of the spectroscopic observations of the party. On this occasion he discovered the green line of the coronal spectrum, and identified it with the line

1,474 of the solar spectrum. He was also a member of the expedition under Prof. Joseph Winlock to observe the eclipse of 1870, at Jerez, Spain, and then discovered that the so-called "reversing layer" of the solar atmosphere produces a bright-line spectrum correlative to the ordinary dark-line spectrum of sunlight. In August, 1872, he was stationed at Sherman, Wyoming, to make solar spectroscopic observations. He went to Pekin as assistant astronomer under Prof. James C. Watson to observe the transit of Venus on 8 Dec., 1874, and in 1878 he had charge of the astronomical expedition that was organized by Princeton to observe the eclipse of 29 July of that year. He devised a form of automatic spectroscope, which has been very generally adopted, and has made a great number of new observations on solar prominences. He has also verified experimentally what is known as Doppler's principle as applied to light, showing that the lines of the spectrum are slightly shifted to one direction or the other according as the source of light is moving toward the earth or away from it. By this means he has been enabled to measure the velocity of the sun's rotation. Prof. Young has given popular lectures at the Peabody institute in Baltimore and the Lowell institute in Boston, and courses at Williams college, and elsewhere. The degree of Ph. D. was given him by the University of Pennsylvania in 1870, and that of LL. D. by Wesleyan university in 1876. He was elected an associate fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1871, and in 1872 a foreign associate of the Royal astronomical society of Great Britain. In 1872 he was chosen to the National academy of sciences, and in 1876 served as vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science, of which organization he was president in 1883. Besides large contributions to astronomical journals, scientific addresses, and magazine articles, he has published "The Sun," in the "International Scientific Series" (New York, 1882), and "A Text-Book of General Astronomy" (Boston, 1888).

YOUNG, David, clergyman, b. in Alleghany county, Pa., 19 March, 1776; d. in Harrisburg, Ohio, 15 Sept., 1859. He emigrated to Ohio, was converted to Methodism by Bishop William McKendree, was licensed to preach in 1801, and continued in the active ministry at various places till 1856. He published "Autobiography of a Pioneer" (Cincinnati, 1857).

YOUNG, George Paxton, Canadian educator, b. in Berwick-on-Tweed, 28 Nov., 1818. He was ordained as a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, and removed to Canada in 1848. The same year he was installed as pastor of Knox church, Hamilton, and in 1851 he became professor of mental and moral philosophy in Knox college, Toronto, which post he resigned, together with his office in the ministry, in 1861. In 1865 he was appointed inspector of grammar-schools for Upper Canada, and in 1871 he became professor of metaphysics and ethics in University college, Toronto. He received the degree of LL. D. in 1882, and is the author of "Miscellaneous Discourses and Expositions of Scripture" (Edinburgh, 1854), and also of "The Philosophical Principles of Natural Religion" (1862).

YOUNG, James, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Galt, Ont., 24 May, 1835. He was educated in his native place, and owned and edited the "Dumfries Reformer" from 1853 till 1863. Mr. Young was elected to represent South Waterloo in the Dominion parliament in 1867, and re-elected by acclamation in 1872 and 1874, but was an unsuccessful candidate for the same constituency in 1878. He was elected to the Ontario legislature for North Hastings in 1879, re-elected by acclamation in 1883, and on 2 June, 1882, became provincial treasurer, which post he resigned on 29 Oct., in consequence of feeble health, but continued to represent Riding till December, 1886, when he declined a renomination. In the Dominion parliament he secured the abolition of the office of queen's printer, in 1873 submitted a bill in favor of the ballot, proposed a committee and report in 1874, which resulted in the publication of the "Hansard," containing the house of commons debates, and was the author of other important measures. He was elected president of the Reform association of Ontario in 1878, has been president of the Sabbath-school association of that province, a member of the Agriculture and arts association of Ontario, and is connected with various industrial and financial associations. He has published two prize essays—"The Agricultural Resources of Canada" (1857) and "The Reciprocity Treaty" (1865)—"Reminiscences of the Early History of Galt and the Settlement of Dumfries" (1880), and "The National Future of Canada" (1887), a collected series of letters published originally in the Toronto "Globe," and in opposition to a commercial union with the United States and to imperial federation.

YOUNG, John, governor of Hawaii, b. in Massachusetts about 1755; d. in Honolulu, Hawaii, in 1835. He shipped about 1789 as boatswain of the "Eleanor," which called at Hawaii a year later. In revenge for the murder of a sailor, the captain killed about 100 natives with grapeshot, and sailed away, accidentally leaving Young on shore. The latter was doomed to death, but was saved through the intercession of the king's niece, Kaoanaeha, who had fallen in love with him. They were soon afterward married, and King Kamehameha made him his chief counsellor, benefited by his instructions in establishing his empire over all the islands, and appointed him governor of the island of Hawaii. Young was the grandfather of Queen Emma Kaleleonalani. (See KALAKAUA.)

YOUNG, John, agricultural writer, b. in Falkirk, Scotland, in September, 1773; d. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 6 Oct., 1837. He was educated in Glasgow, became a merchant, emigrated to Nova Scotia in 1814, and was the representative of Sydney in the provincial assembly from 1825 till his death. He also filled the office of secretary of the Nova Scotia board of agriculture, having awakened a wide-spread interest in agricultural economy by a series of letters that were published under the signature of "Agricola" in the Halifax "Recorder" in 1818, and taken an active part in the formation of agricultural societies, to which the first impetus was given by his letters, which were published in book-form under the title of "Letters of Agricola on the Principles of Vegetation and Tillage" (Halifax, 1822). He also prepared a "Report of the Proceedings of the Agricultural Society of Halifax" (Halifax, 1823-'4).—His son, George R., author, b. in Scotland; d. in Halifax, N. S., was a member of parliament, and the author of several important works, the chief of which was a sketch of "Colonial Literature, Science, and Education." He was also the founder of the "Nova Scotian," a paper which in after years, under the editorship of Joseph Howe, exerted wide influence. He also published "Letters to E. G. S. Stanley, M. P., upon the Existing Treaties with France and America as regards their Rights of Fishery" (London, 1834), and "History, Principles, and Prospects of the Bank of British North America and of the Colonial Bank" (1838).—Another son,

Sir William, Canadian jurist, b. in Falkirk, Stirlingshire, Scotland, 29 July, 1799; d. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 8 May, 1887, was educated at Glasgow university, went to Nova Scotia with his family in 1814, and aided his father in business until 1820, when he entered a law-office. In 1826 he was admitted a barrister, and in 1843 he became queen's counsel. He entered into partnership with his brothers, and in 1832 was elected to the Prince Edward island house of assembly. Later, when the island was divided, he sat for Inverness from 1837 till 1859. In 1838 Mr. Young was sent as one of a delegation to Quebec to meet Lord Durham to discuss matters affecting the prosperity of the province. During the session of 1839 Mr. Young was appointed a delegate to represent to the imperial government the views of Nova Scotia regarding certain reforms, which were accomplished. In 1840 he was active in the demonstrations against Sir Colin Campbell, then lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, which resulted in his recall, and he was equally hostile to his successor, the Viscount Falkland. In 1843 Young was elected speaker of the house of assembly by a majority of two votes. On 8 Feb., 1844, the new house met, when Young, who had been elevated to a seat in the executive council, but had resigned on his appointment to the speakership, was re-elected speaker. In 1847 Sir John Harvey, who succeeded Lord Falkland, proposed a coalition; but Young opposed the suggestion with his accustomed vigor. A new election was determined upon, in which the reformers were victors, and Young was a third time elected speaker. In the session of 1850 he was appointed on a commission to consolidate and simplify the laws. This is said to have been the first time that an attempt of the sort was ever made in a British colony. In 1854 Mr. Young assumed the office of attorney-general, and formed a ministry, that was defeated shortly afterward, but in 1860 Mr. Young and his party again assumed control of affairs. He became premier and president of the council, and on the death of Chief-Justice Sir Brenton Halliburton in the same year, was appointed to that post. Soon afterward he was created judge of the vice-admiralty, an imperial appointment, and in 1868 he was knighted by the queen. For many years Sir William he was a member of the board of governors of Dalhousie university, Halifax, and chairman of that body. He declined the lieutenant-governorship of Nova Scotia. On 4 May, 1881, he resigned his seat on the bench, and at his death he left the greater part of his wealth to charitable and educational institutions.—Another son, Charles, Canadian jurist, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 30 April, 1812, studied in Dalhousie college, Halifax, where he took honors, and entered the law-office of his brothers, George and William. In 1838 he was called to the bars of Nova Scotia and of Prince Edward island, and, forming a copartnership with his brothers, practised for several years. On 23 Nov., 1847, he was the first barrister in Prince Edward island to be appointed queen's counsel. At the age of twenty-eight he entered the island house of assembly, and was soon transferred to the legislative council, where he sat for twenty-three years, during ten of which he was its president. In 1851-'2 and 1858-'9 he was attorney-general, and he was also administrator of the government of Prince Edward island for four years. Like his brother William, he was a warm supporter of the policy of responsible government, and he was the first public man in the island to espouse that principle. In 1852 he received his appointment as judge of probate, and sixteen years later he became judge in bankruptcy. In March, 1875, he retired from the latter post. As a barrister he had a very large and lucrative practice, hardly a case of importance occurring in which he was not retained. In tenantry cases he was almost invariably retained by the tenants, and the peculiar land laws of the island found always in him a ready and logical interpreter. He frequently delivered public lectures, and the Mechanics' institute of Charlottetown owes to him its foundation. Since 1845 he has been a warm temperance advocate, and he has been a local preacher of the Methodist church for many years. In 1858 the queen offered him the dignity of knighthood, which he declined.

YOUNG, John, governor of New York, b. in Chelsea, Vt., 12 June, 1802; d. in New York city, 23 April, 1852. He was taken in early life to Coney Island, Livingston co., N. Y., received a common-school education, taught himself the classics, was a teacher for several years, studied law in Geneseo, was admitted to the bar in 1827, and attained a high reputation, especially as a jury lawyer. Early in life he engaged in politics, supporting Andrew Jackson in 1828, and in the following year attaching himself to the anti-Masonic party, by which he was elected to the legislature in 1832. He was elected to congress as a Whig in 1836, and served from 4 Dec. of that year till 3 March, 1837. He declined a re-election for the following term, but was again put in nomination in 1840, and was elected, took his seat when congress was called together in extra session on 31 May, 1841, and served till 3 March, 1843. He was elected to the legislature in 1844, became leader of the Whigs, and carried through the bill for a constitutional convention, with the aid of the Hunker or Radical Democratic vote. He was re-elected in 1845, acquired great popularity as the champion of the anti-renters, received the Whig nomination for governor in 1846, and was elected. He condemned the Mexican war in his messages, and sanctioned resolutions of the legislature in favor of excluding slavery from the territory that had been acquired from Mexico. He supported Henry Clay's candidacy in the Whig national convention of 1848. In July, 1849, he was appointed assistant treasurer of the United States in New York city.

YOUNG, Sir John, Baron LISGAR, governor-general of Canada, b. in the presidency of Bombay, British India, 31 Aug., 1807; d. in Ireland, 6 Oct., 1876.

His father, Sir William Young, bart., was a director of the East India company. In his childhood the son left India for England, and he was graduated at Oxford in 1829. He studied law, and in 1834 was called to the bar. He sat in the house of commons as a conservative from 1831 till 1855, from 1841 till 1844 was a

In 1855 he was transferred to the Ionian islands as lord high commissioner. On the death of his father in 1848 he had succeeded to the baronetcy, and for his services in connection with the Ionian islands mission he was decorated by the queen with the grand cross of the order of St. Michael and St. George. In 1860 he was sent to New South Wales as governor. His administration of that colony lasted nearly seven years, when he returned to England, and in 1868 received the appointment of governor-general of Canada, and governor and commander-in-chief of Prince Edward island, which had not then entered the union, in succession to Viscount Monck. He arrived in November, and was sworn as governor-general on 29 Dec. He remained in office until June, 1872, when he was succeeded by the Earl of Dufferin. In 1870 his long public services were rewarded with a peerage, when he took the title of Baron Lisgar, and in the year following he was constituted lord lieutenant and custos rotulorum of the county of Cavan. As governor-general of Canada, Lord Lisgar proved a capable and dignified ruler. He was not a man given to much social display, but he was a constitutional student and a hard-working official. He had been trained in a severe school, and during his career in the Dominion he had opportunity for the exercise of his talent and knowledge of public affairs. While governor he had to deal with the Red river rebellion, Louis Riel's first insurrection in the northwest; the Washington treaty was signed, Nova Scotia secured "better terms," Manitoba and British Columbia joined in the confederation, and the terms for building the Canadian Pacific railway were agreed upon. He was in feeble health most of the time that he was in Canada, but he contrived to do his duty in an exceptionally able manner, and he won many friends. At the close of his term he retired to his estates in Ireland, and passed the remainder of his days quietly. The title expired with him, and, as he had no children, the estate passed to his nephew, the present baronet, Sir William Muston Need Young.

YOUNG, John, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Ayr, Scotland, 4 March, 1811; d. in Montreal, Canada, 12 April, 1878. He emigrated to Canada in 1826, became a clerk in the establishment of John Torrance at Montreal, and in 1835 he entered into partnership with David Torrance at Quebec. During the rebellion of 1837 he served as a captain of volunteers. Mr. Young returned to Montreal in 1840 and joined Harrison Stephens in business. In 1845 he was one of the originators of the project for the construction of the railway to Portland, Me., and he also advocated the construction of a railway from Montreal to the west and became president of the projected line. About the same time he suggested and advocated the necessity of a bridge across the St. Lawrence at Montreal, and advanced the funds for the survey, the route being adopted for the Victoria bridge. In 1851 Mr. Young was appointed commissioner of public works in the Hincks-Morin cabinet, was elected to represent the city of Montreal, and continued its representative till his health compelled him to retire in 1857. In 1851 he resigned the commissionership of public works in consequence of the determination of the government to charge differential tolls on American vessels passing through Welland canal. He was an unsuccessful candidate for Montreal, west, in 1863, was elected in 1872, and retired in 1874.

YOUNG, John Clarke, educator, b. in Greencastle, Pa., 12 Aug., 1803; d. in Danville, Ky., 23

lord of the treasury, and during the next two years secretary of the treasury. From 1852 till 1855, during the premiership of the Earl of Aberdeen, Sir John Young was sent to Ireland as chief secretary.

June, 1857. He was the son of an eminent clergyman of the Associate Reformed church, studied at Columbia for three years, then went to Dickinson college, where he was graduated in 1823, spent two years at Princeton seminary, and, while acting as a tutor in Princeton college during the next two years, was licensed to preach by the New York presbytery on 7 March, 1827. He was installed as pastor of a Presbyterian church in Louisville, Ky., in 1828, and two years later was chosen president of Centre college, which office he filled until his death, officiating also after 1834 as pastor of a Presbyterian church in Danville. In a controversy with the Rev. Samuel Crothers and William Steele he upheld the views of the Kentucky emancipationists and deprecated the aims of the Abolitionists. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1839, and in 1853 was moderator of the general assembly. His first wife was a niece of the Rev. Robert J. Breckinridge and his second a daughter of John J. Crittenden. His publications include a "Speech before the Kentucky Colonization Society" (1832), and an "Address to the Presbyterians of Kentucky, proposing a Plan for the Instruction and Emancipation of their Slaves," which he prepared in 1834 for the committee of the Kentucky synod that had passed resolutions in favor of gradual emancipation. Of the address 100,000 copies were circulated. It elicited the strictures of the Ohio Abolitionists, to whom Dr. Young replied in a letter entitled "The Doctrine of Immediate Emancipation Unsound," which first appeared in the newspapers in 1835.

YOUNG, John Freeman, P. E. bishop, b. in Pittston, Kennebec co., Me., 30 Oct., 1820; d. in New York city, 15 Nov., 1885. He began a scientific course at Wesleyan university in 1841, but left that institution during freshman year. He then became a student in the Virginia theological seminary at Alexandria, where he was graduated in 1845. He was at once ordained to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, and preached successively in Florida, Texas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. In 1860-'7 he was assistant minister of Trinity church, New York. Having been elected the second bishop of Florida, he was consecrated, 25 July, 1867, and held the office until the time of his death. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia college in 1865. Bishop Young has published in pamphlet-form a series of twenty-five hymns in the Spanish language, with tunes, also "Great Hymns of the Church" (New York, 1887).

YOUNG, John Russell, journalist, b. in Downing, Chester co., Pa., 20 Nov., 1841. He received his education in the public schools of Philadelphia and the New Orleans high-school. He entered the employment of the Philadelphia "Press" in 1857 as copy-boy, and was promoted to other duties till at the beginning of the civil war he was sent to Virginia as war-correspondent. He remained with the Army of the Potomac from the battle of Bull Run till the end of the Chickahominy campaign. In 1864 he accompanied Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks on his Red river expedition, after which he returned to Philadelphia to assume editorial charge of the "Press." He resigned in 1865 and attempted to establish a new paper in Philadelphia, which he called the "Morning Post," and after its failure began the publication of one in New York city named the "Standard," with which he had no better success. He then connected himself with the New York "Tribune," of which he was managing editor from 1866 till 1869. Having studied law for the prescribed term, he obtained admission to the bar in 1867. In 1871 he went to Europe as a correspondent of the New York "Herald," and was engaged in collecting news in Great Britain and on the continent till 1877, when, as commissioner of the "Herald," he accompanied ex-President Grant around the world. After his return to New York city in 1879 he resumed his place on the editorial staff. On 15 March, 1882, he was appointed U. S. minister to China. He filled that post until the accession of President Cleveland, and then returned to New York and engaged in his former occupation. He has published "Around the World with General Grant" (2 vols., New York, 1879).—His brother, James Rankin, journalist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 6 March, 1847, enlisted in the emergency campaign of 1863, and then entered the volunteer army in 1864, serving until the close of the war. In 1866 he became connected with the New York "Tribune," was its Washington correspondent until 1871, when he became executive clerk of the U. S. senate, which place he has since held. He is one of the owners of the Philadelphia "Evening Star," to which he has contributed the "S. M." correspondence.

YOUNG, Jonathan, naval officer, b. in Ohio, 27 Nov., 1825; d. in New London, Conn., 17 May, 1885. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 19 Oct., 1841, and served in the West Indies, where he participated in an engagement with pirates on the Isle of Pines off the south coast of Cuba, and captured a slaver with 500 slaves on board. He cruised in the ship-of-the-line "Columbus" around the world, 1845-'8, and at Yeddo, Japan, succeeded in forcibly delivering a letter to the Japanese government. He became a passed midshipman, 10 Aug., 1847, was commissioned a master, 14 Sept., 1855, and a lieutenant the next day, while on a cruise in the steamer "Massachusetts," of the Pacific station. In this cruise he participated in engagements with Indians in Puget sound. He commanded the steamer "Westernport" in the Paraguay expedition of 1859, and when the civil war began was serving in the steamer "Susquehanna" in the Mediterranean, in which he returned, 6 June, 1861, and participated in the capture of the forts at Hatteras inlet, 28 Aug., 1861, and of Port Royal, S. C., 7 Nov., 1861. He was executive in the steamer "Powhatan" in chase of the Confederate privateer "Sumter" to Brazil and Gibraltar in 1861-'2, commanded the steamer "Pembina," of the Western Gulf squadron, a short time in 1863, and was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and to commander, 25 July, 1866, commanded the receiving-ship at Portsmouth, N. H., 1866-'7, and steamer "Mahaska," North Atlantic squadron, 1868-'9, served at the naval observatory in Washington, 1869, and navy-yard, Portsmouth, 1869-'72. He was chief of staff on the flag-ship "Lancaster," of the Brazil squadron, in 1873, was commissioned a captain, 8 Nov., 1873, commanded the steamer "Tennessee," of the Asiatic squadron, in 1876-'8, and served at the navy-yard, Portsmouth, in 1879-'81. He was promoted to commodore, 19 June, 1882, and commanded the naval station at New London in 1882-'5.

YOUNG, Josué Marie, R. C. bishop, b. in the part of Acton that is now called Shapleigh, Me., 29 Oct., 1808; d. in Erie, Pa., 18 Sept., 1866. His father, Jonathan, a graduate of Harvard, was a Universalist in religion, and the son was educated in the Congregational faith by a maternal uncle, who was a descendant of the Rev. Samuel Moody. He was apprenticed to a printer at Portland in 1823, adopted Universalist views for a time, and then became a convert to Catholicism. For a year after his apprenticeship he edited the "Maine Democrat" at Saco, and then emigrated to the west, working at his trade in Kentucky and afterward in Cincinnati, Ohio. His religious zeal and his talents attracted the notice of Bishop John B. Purcell, who sent him to Mount St. Mary's college, Emmitsburg, to prepare for the ministry. He adopted a new middle name in the place of his original one of Moody, was ordained priest in 1837, and labored for seven years as a missionary in the west and afterward as parish priest at Lancaster, Ohio. When the diocese of Erie was formed in 1853 by the division of the former diocese of Pittsburgh, he was nominated as the successor of Bishop Michael O'Connor, who was translated to the new see at his own suggestion. Dr. Young, however, was reluctant to take the place of the older bishop at Pittsburgh, but agreed to accept an appointment as bishop of Erie. He was consecrated on 23 April, 1854. His administration of the diocese was distinguished for zeal and energy, and resulted in an increase of churches from 28 to more than 50, and of clergymen from 14 to 51. He established academies and schools, orphan asylums, and an infirmary and hospital, was rigid in religious exercises, laborious in his episcopal visitations, assiduous in preparing young men for the spiritual office, and active in the promotion of temperance, and was an earnest preacher, attracting many Protestant hearers.

YOUNG, Loyal, clergyman, b. in Charlemont, Mass., 1 July, 1806. He was graduated at Jefferson college in 1828, and at the Western theological seminary, Alleghany City, Pa., in 1832, was licensed to preach by the Ohio presbytery on 21 July of that year, and installed at the same time as pastor of the church at Butler, Pa. He remained in this relation till 1868, then was pastor of the church at French Creek, W. Va., for eight years, and for five years had charge of one at Parkersburg, W. Va., after which he labored as a missionary for four years in Winfield, W. Va. The degree of D. D. was given him by Washington college in 1858. He has been a trustee of Washington college and of the Western theological seminary. Dr. Young is the author of "Interviews with Inspired Men" (Pittsburg, 1857); "Commentary on the Book of Ecclesiastes" (Philadelphia, 1866); "From Dawn to Dusk, a Pastor's Panorama" (Claremont, N. H., 1884); and "Ecce Diluvium, or Noah's Account of the Flood" (Washington, Pa., 1887).

YOUNG, Pierce Manning Butler, soldier, b. in Spartanburg, S. C., 15 Nov., 1839. He was taken to Georgia when he was a year old, was educated at the military institute in that state, began the study of law, and then entered the U. S. military academy in 1857. Within two months of the time for graduation he resigned on account of the secession of the southern states, and joined the Confederate army as a 2d lieutenant. He was successively promoted through all the grades of the service to that of major-general on 12 Dec., 1864, when he was assigned to the command of a cavalry division. He resided in Cartersville, Ga., after the war, and was the only Democrat who was elected to congress when representation was restored under the reconstruction acts, taking his seat on 25 July, 1868. He was re-elected for the three succeeding terms, serving till 3 March, 1875. Gen. Young has been a delegate to every National Democratic convention since 1868. In 1877 he was appointed one of the commissioners from the United States to the World's fair held in Paris. He was appointed consul-general to St. Petersburg, Russia, in 1885, but, owing to the severe climate, resigned a year later, and has since resided on his plantation near Atlanta, Ga.

YOUNG, Richard Montgomery, senator, b. in Kentucky in 1796; d. in Washington, D. C., about 1852. He removed to Jonesboro', Ill., and was admitted to the bar, 28 Sept., 1817. He was a member of the general assembly in 1820-'2, became judge of the 3d judicial district of Illinois, 19 July, 1825, and in 1828 was presidential elector on the Democratic ticket. On 23 Jan., 1829, he was commissioned judge of the 5th circuit, which included what is now Cook county. In 1836 he was elected U. S. senator, and in 1839 he was appointed a state agent to negotiate the state internal improvement bonds, and went to Europe for that purpose. He was commissioned associate justice of the supreme court on 4 Feb., 1843, and held the post till he resigned, 25 Jan., 1847. In 1847 he was appointed commissioner of the general land office, and in 1850-'1 he was clerk of the house of representatives at Washington.

YOUNG, Thomas John, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S. C., 22 Oct., 1803; d. there, 11 Oct., 1852. He was graduated at Yale in 1823, ordained priest in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1827, was pastor of the united parishes of St. Luke and Prince William in 1828-'36, of St John's church, John's island, in 1836-'47, and assistant rector of St. Michael's church, Charleston, from 1847 till his death. In the diocesan convention of 1838 he was elected a delegate to the general convention at Philadelphia, and he was re-elected till 1850, when, owing to impaired health, he declined to serve any longer. In the diocesan convention of 1841 he was appointed one of the committee of three to revise the constitution, canons, and the rules of order of the church, and of this committee he was the one selected to do the work. He was one of the originators of the Church home in Charleston, and delivered the address at its opening in 1851. In 1849 he visited Europe. He published sermons and addresses.

YOUNG, Thomas Lowry, soldier, b. in Killyleagh, Ireland, 14 Dec., 1832; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 20 July, 1888. He came to this country at an early age, served in the U. S. army during the last year of the war with Mexico, and afterward taught in Cincinnati. He entered the National army at the beginning of the civil war, and was promoted colonel, but, having contracted disease in the Atlanta campaign, he was honorably discharged in September, 1864, and brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865. He was graduated at the Cincinnati law-school, admitted to the bar in 1865, the same year was appointed assistant city auditor of Cincinnati, and was elected a member of the state house of representatives for a term of two years. He was elected recorder of Hamilton county in 1867, appointed a supervisor of internal revenue in 1868, and was a delegate to the National Republican convention the same year. He was elected state senator in 1871, lieutenant-governor in 1875, and in 1877 became governor after Rutherford B. Hayes was chosen president. He served in congress in 1878-'82, and in 1886 was appointed a member of the board of public affairs of Cincinnati, which office he held at his death.

YOUNG, William, journalist, b. in Deptford, England, in 1809; d. in Paris, France, 15 April, 1888. His father was an admiral in the royal navy. He married an American lady in 1839, and came to this country, where, from 1848 till 1867, he edited in New York city "The Albion," a paper devoted to British news and interests. In 1868 he established "Every Afternoon," which was discontinued in four weeks with heavy loss. He then removed to Paris, where he afterward resided. Mr. Young published "Two Hundred Lyrical Poems of Béranger, done into English Verse" (New York, 1850); "Carmina Collegensia" (1868); "Mathieu Ropars, etc., by an Ex-Editor" (1868); and "The Man who Laughs," from the French of Victor Hugo (1869). He also wrote the letter-press for a collection of photographs entitled "Lights and Shades of New York Picture Galleries" (1863), and adapted several plays from the French.

YOUNG, William Henry Harrison Hutchinson, journalist, b. in Amherst, Erie co., N. Y., 4 May, 1819. He was educated at Fredonia academy, N. Y., admitted to the bar, and practised in Buffalo, but removed to the south, took part in the Texan revolution and the Mexican war, and also edited the Savannah "Georgian" and "Young's Spirit of the South" at Nashville, Tenn., and Louisville, Ky. He has also been connected editorially with several papers at the north, including the "Spirit of the Times," the "Democratic Review," and the Cincinnati "Sunday Dispatch." He married a wealthy southern lady, and together they aided in establishing the "Kinney Colony" in Nicaragua, publishing there the "Central American." At the opening of the civil war they raised and equipped at their own expense Young's Kentucky light cavalry (afterward the 3d Pennsylvania cavalry), which was the first cavalry regiment to take the field, and of which Mr. Young became colonel. Since the war Col. Young has practised law in Washington, and has been interested in establishing a colony of veteran soldiers in Florida. He and his wife also founded the New York volunteer institute, a school in which they educated 900 soldiers' orphans at their own expense. Col. Young has invented and patented an artificial stone.

YSABEAU, Alphonse Paul (ee-zah-bo), French naval officer, b. in Dunkirk in 1811; d. in Fort de France, Martinique, in December, 1848. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1826, was promoted ensign in 1832 and lieutenant in 1837, sailed in the fleet that under Admiral De Mackau blockaded Buenos Ayres in 1840-'3, and was employed in hydrographic service in the river Plate. He made also a survey of the lower basin of the Parana. After a short sojourn in France he was attached to the station of Martinique, and died in Fort de France of yellow fever. He wrote "Rapport sur le bassin inférieur du Parana" (Paris, 1845); "Journal d'un témoin du siège de Buenos Ayres" (2 vols., 1846); and "Études sur les révolutions et les guerres civiles dans l'Amérique du Sud" (3 vols., Fort de France, 1848).

YSAMBERT, Gustave (ee-zahm-bair), French naval officer, b. in Brittany in 1667; d. in Rio Janeiro, Brazil, 18 March, 1711. After commanding a privateer in the West Indies and the Pacific ocean, he entered the royal navy about 1700, with the rank of commander. In 1710 he sailed as chief-of-staff of Jean Baptiste Duclerc in the latter's expedition to Brazil. On 6 Aug. they sighted Rio Janeiro, which they could have then carried by a speedy attack, but, Duclerc's intention being opposed by Ysambert and the council of war, they anchored on 17 Aug. at a point near Tejuco and landed 900 marines. The Portuguese meanwhile had prepared for resistance, and when the French arrived at Novo Engenho dos Padres da Companhia, six miles from Rio Janeiro, they met a Portuguese division which they defeated. Failing to receive co-operation from the fleet, which had been dispersed by a tempest, they were attacked, on 18 Sept., by the viceroy, Francisco de Castro Moraes, with superior forces, but routed him and followed the fugitives into the city. Being received there by a cross-fire from fortified buildings, Ysambert with a small party barricaded himself in the city-hall, while Duclerc took shelter in the custom-house. After a heavy loss, Duclerc agreed to capitulate on condition that his forces should be returned to France; but Ysambert, whose position was stronger, was reluctant to trust the Portuguese, and continued resistance till he received peremptory orders from Duclerc to comply with the terms of the capitulation. The leaders were well treated, but a few days later the French fleet, unaware of the surrender, made an attack on the city. The viceroy proclaimed the capitulation violated, and the officers were thereafter kept in close confinement. Duclerc and Ysambert were killed by the guard in an attempt to escape, or murdered, according to other historians, on 18 March, 1711. Their death was avenged a few months later by Dugay-Trouin, who released the surviving French prisoners.

YSAMBERT, Jules Henri d', French administrator, b. in Nancy, Lorraine, in 1739; d. there in 1795. He entered the quartermaster's department of the French army and came to this country in 1780 with Count de Rochambeau, serving afterward in Santo Domingo till 1792, when he was recalled to France, and afterward imprisoned during the reign of terror. He published "Mémoire sur les opérations des intendants pendant la campagne de M. le Comte de Rochambeau aux États-Unis de l'Amérique en 1780-'82," written in answer to charges of dishonesty and fraud against the quartermaster's department of Rochambeau's army (Brest, 1785); "Journal d'un témoin de la guerre d'Amérique" (1786); and "Le dernier boucanier," a historical novel, containing interesting information about the West Indies and the life of a privateer (Nancy, 1788).

YSOART, Sigismund (ee-zo-ar), Flemish author, b. in Ypres in 1604; d. in Amsterdam in 1652. He was a mariner, made voyages to South America and Cape Horn, and, entering the service of the West Indian company in 1641, was employed for several years in Guiana, and commanded the fleet that devastated the southern coast of Brazil in 1647. In 1649 he made a chart of the Caribbean sea and the coast of Guiana, and, being promoted in the following year a director of the West Indian company, settled in Amsterdam, where he died. He wrote a narrative of his expedition entitled "Diarum nauticum itineris Bavatorum in Indias Occidentales" (Amsterdam, 1650), and contributed to the second edition of the "Histoire du commencement et des progrès de la compagnie des Indes Occidentales des Provinces Unies des Pays Bas, contenant les principaux voyages" (3 vols., Amsterdam, 1655-'6).

YULEE, David Levy, senator, b. in the West Indies in 1811; d. in New York city, 10 Oct., 1886. His father, whose name was Levy, was of Hebrew extraction. The son removed with him to Virginia when quite young, and there received the rudiments of a classical education. In 1824 he went to Florida, studied law, and engaged in planting. He was elected a delegate to congress from that territory, and served from 31 March, 1841, till 3 March, 1845, under the name of David Levy, but afterward changed it to David Levy Yulee, under which designation he was subsequently known. He was a delegate to the State constitutional convention, was elected a U. S. senator from Florida as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1845, till 3 March, 1851, and was again in the senate from 3 Dec., 1855, till 21 Jan., 1861, when he retired to join the southern Confederacy. During the civil war he served as a member of the Confederate congress, and at its termination was confined as a prisoner of state at Fort Pulaski until he was pardoned. At one time he was president of the Atlantic and Gulf railroad in Florida. Mr. Yulee was interested in the development of Fernandina and Cedar Keys, and was one of the corporators of the railroad between those two places.

YUNG WING, diplomatist, b. in Nan Ping, province of Kwang Tung, China, 17 Nov., 1828. He became a pupil of Samuel R. Brown, D. D., who was then a teacher in China under the auspices of the Morrison education society, and accompanied Dr. Brown to the United States in April, 1847. He was graduated at Yale in 1854, and was engaged in the tea and silk business until 1864, when he entered the service of the Chinese government, and was commissioned to purchase machinery in the United States for what is now the Kiang Nan arsenal. In 1870, at Tientsin, he submitted four propositions to the high commissioners that had been appointed to settle the affair of the massacre of Christians at that place. The first was the transportation of the tribute rice in steamers by sea, freight to be paid by the government as subsidy to a Chinese stock company to create a fleet of ocean and river steamers. This company is now the well-known China merchant steam navigation company. Secondly, he proposed the education of Chinese youths abroad, to facilitate intercourse with foreigners, and develop the resources of the empire. The third proposal was the opening of the rivers of China, and the fourth to terminate the pretensions of the Roman Catholic church in her claim to exercise jurisdiction over native proselytes. The first and second propositions were carried out in 1872, and within the next two years 120 youth were sent to the United States in charge of commissioners, one of whom was Yung Wing, who was made a mandarin of the third rank by brevet. In 1874 he went to Peru to investigate the affairs of the Chinese laborers there. In 1878 he was appointed assistant minister resident of China at Washington, with privilege of wearing the button of the second rank by brevet. In 1881 the Chinese students were recalled, and the educational scheme was abandoned. In 1882 he returned to China, and was appointed expectant intendant of Kiang Su province; but on account of the health of his wife he returned to Hartford, Conn. He was made a citizen of the United States on 30 Oct., 1852, and in 1875, married Miss Mary Kellogg, of Avon, Conn., who died on 29 May, 1886.

YVER DE CHAZELLES, Jean Pierre (éevair), French navigator, b. in St. Aubin du Cormier in 1709; d. there in 1786. In 1750 he obtained the command of an expedition to search for the northwest passage, and, after visiting Iceland, anchored in June at Vagna-fjord, on the coast of Greenland, where he built barracks. He undertook an expedition to the interior, and discovered a chain of high mountains, which were seen again in 1869 by the Austrian scientific expedition of Karl Koldewey. Resuming his journey, he coasted Greenland, prepared a valuable chart of all its inlets and fjords, and anchored at Vorland island, 81° north latitude. He was the first navigator to reach 81° 30' north latitude, where he was imprisoned by icebergs from December, 1750, till March, 1751, and then drifted to the south, visiting Spitzbergen on the homeward journey. He related the results of his expedition in "Voyage à la recherche du passage du Nord-Ouest" (4 vols., Rennes, 1752-'3). Yver was promoted brigadier-general of the naval forces, and fought with credit in the West Indies, twice relieving Tobago, raising the blockade of Cape François in Santo Domingo, and defending St. Vincent and Grenada. From 1764 till 1766 he was occupied in making a chart of the Caribbean sea, and in 1766-'8 he visited Mexico. He made in 1769 an expedition to the coast of Patagonia and the Strait of Lemaire, and retired in 1772, but re-entered active service when France joined in the war for American independence, and was employed in the West Indies and the Indian and Pacific oceans. Yver's works include "Atlas de la mer des Antilles" (Rennes, 1773); "Instructions aux navigateurs sur le débouquement de Saint Domingue" (1774); "De Mexico à Acapulco dans le royaume de la Nouvelle Espagne, avec un aperçu sur l'état politique et la condition sociale des Indiens" (2 vols., 1778); and "Histoire de la marine Française au dixseptième siècle" (4 vols., 1784-'6).

YVES D'ÉVREUX, Pierre (eev-day-vrö), French missionary, b. in Normandy about 1570; d. in Évreux about 1630. He entered the Capuchin order and was prior of the convent at Évreux in 1611, when he was named one of the three missionaries to accompany Claude d'Abbeville to Brazil. They anchored opposite Marajo island, at the mouth of the Amazon, built houses and a chapel on the island, and were soon on friendly terms with the Indians. Father Claude returned to France in 1612, and Yves led an expedition through the interior of Brazil, collecting medicinal plants and specimens in natural history. Early in 1613 Razilly sailed for La Rochelle, leaving about twenty soldiers to guard the fort, and promised reinforcements and supplies; but they never came, and Father Claude freighted a schooner, which carried the settlers and missionaries to the West Indies. Yves wrote an account of his voyage to Brazil which was published at the end of Claude d'Abbeville's narrative, "Histoire de la mission des P. P. Capucins, à l'île de Maragnon et terres circonvoisines" (Paris, 1615), and was reprinted with notes and an introduction by Ferdinand Denis, from the only known copy, which is preserved in the national library at Paris. It is entitled "Voyage dans le nord du Brésil, fait pendant les années 1611 à 1614" (Paris, 1864).

Z

ZABRISKIE, Abraham Oothout, jurist, b. in Greenbush (now East Albany), N. Y., 10 June, 1807; d. in Truckee, Cal., 27 June, 1873. He was graduated at Princeton in 1825, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1828. He practised for two years in Newark, and then removed to Hackensack, N. J., where he remained till 1849. He was reporter of the supreme court of New Jersey from 1848 till 1856. Removing to Jersey City from Hackensack, he was elected to the state senate, and took an important part in framing the city charter of 1851 and in other legislation. He became chancellor of New Jersey in 1866, and died while he was on a journey soon after the completion of his term.

ZACHOS, John Celivergos (zak'-os), educator, b. in Constantinople, Turkey, 20 Dec., 1820. He is of Greek parentage, and came to this country when he was ten years old with Dr. Samuel G. Howe. He was graduated at Kenyon college, Ohio, in 1840, and in 1842-'5 studied at the medical school of Miami university, but did not take his degree. He was associate principal in Cooper female seminary, Dayton, Ohio, in 1851-'4, and principal of the grammar-school of Antioch college, Yellow Springs, Ohio, in 1855-'7. During the civil war he served in the army as an assistant surgeon, and in 1865, having studied theology privately, he was ordained pastor of the Unitarian church in West Newton, Mass. In 1866-'7 he was pastor at Meadville, Pa., and professor of rhetoric in the theological school in that place. Since 1871 he has been curator of the Cooper union, New York city. Dr. Zachos invented and patented in 1876 the stenotype, for printing a legible text from the English alphabet at a reporting speed. In this machine the types are fixed on eighteen shuttle-bars, two or more of which may be simultaneously placed in position, and the impression is given by a plunger common to all the bars. Improvements were patented in 1883 and 1886. He edited the "Ohio Journal of Education" in 1852, and is the author of "New American Speaker" (New York, 1852); "Analytical Elocution" (1861); "New System of Phonic Reading without changing the Orthography," a pamphlet (Boston, 1863); and a "Phonic Primer and Reader" (1864).

ZAKRZEWSKA, Maria Elizabeth (sahr-zhev'-skah), physician, b. in Berlin, Prussia, 6 Sept., 1829. She is of Polish descent. After studying medicine and serving as an assistant and afterward as a teacher in the college in which she had studied, she came to this country in 1853, and was graduated at Cleveland medical college. With Elizabeth and Emily Blackwell she established the New York infirmary, which she superintended two years, as resident physician and manager. After her removal to Boston in 1863 she founded the New England hospital for women and children.

ZALDIVAR, Rafael, Central American statesman, b. about 1830. He studied law, taking part also in politics, and when in 1876 the government of Andres Valle was defeated by the Guatemalan army under Gen. Rufino Barrios, the Salvador junta de notables assembled in accordance with the capitulation of 25 April, and nominated Zaldivar as provisional president, and in May he was elected constitutionally. His administration was enlightened and progressive; he fostered the planting of cacao, rubber-trees, and the maguey or American agave for the fibre industry, and founded an agricultural college and a model experimental farm. In 1883 he was re-elected, in the next year made an extended trip through the United States, England, France, and Spain, and on his return held an interview in September, 1884, with the presidents of Guatemala and Honduras regarding the proposed union of the five Central American republics. When Barrios suddenly issued, on 18 Feb., 1885, his famous decree proclaiming himself provisional chief of the restored Central American union, Zaldivar seemed to accept the idea enthusiastically, and nearly forced President Bogran, of Honduras, to subscribe to it, but when he saw the opposition in his own country and the formal protest of the governments of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, he opened negotiations with Mexico, and finally concluded a secret treaty with Costa Rica and Nicaragua, in the mean time arming apparently to assist Barrios. Finally, when the latter prepared to join the Salvador army, Zaldivar threw aside the mask and on 9 March telegraphed Barrios, declaring against him, and advanced his army of nearly 10,000 men, under Gen. Monterosa, toward the frontier. After the indecisive fight of Chalchualpa on 30 March, Monterosa retreated to San Lorenzo, after Barrios's death the Guatemalan congress proposed an armistice, and on 14 April peace was concluded. On the 21st of that month Zaldivar proposed to the provisional president of Guatemala, Barillas, a Central American union, with a congress of delegates from the five republics to meet on 15 May at Santa Rosa; but the proposal was not accepted, and he delivered the executive to Gen. Figueroa, and in May sailed for France, where he has since lived.

ZALDIVAR MENDOZA, Vicente (thal'-deev-ar), Mexican soldier, b. in Zacatecas in 1565; d. there about 1625. He entered the military service, and in 1600 went with his uncle, Juan de Oñate, as second commander of the expedition that was sent by the viceroy, Count de Monterey, to the conquest of New Mexico. Although they penetrated to 37° north latitude, and established there a fort and mission, under the name of San Gabriel, affairs were mismanaged, for which some writers blame Oñate and others Zaldivar, and the station was abandoned in 1604. On his return, Zaldivar retired from military service and settled in his native city, where he endowed in 1616 a Jesuit college. He wrote "Relación dirigida al Rey, Nuestro Señor, sobre la expedición y pacificación del Nuevo Mexico," which is preserved in manuscript in the archives of the Indies, and is to be published in the government collection.

ZALINSKI, Edmund Louis Gray, soldier, b. in Kurnick, Prussian Poland, 13 Dec., 1849. He came to the United States in 1853, attended school at Seneca Falls, N. Y., until 1861, and subsequently was at the high-school in Syracuse, N. Y., until 1863. At the age of fifteen he entered the army, serving at first as volunteer aide-de-camp on the staff of Gen. Nelson A. Miles from October, 1864, till February, 1865. He was commissioned 2d lieutenant in the 2d New York heavy artillery in February, 1865, having been recommended for the appointment by his superior officers for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Hatcher's Run, Va. After being commissioned he continued on Gen. Miles's staff until after the surrender of Gen. Robert E. Lee, participating in all of the engagements up to that date. He was mustered out of the volunteer service in September, 1865, and recommended for an appointment in the regular army, where he was commissioned a 2d lieutenant in the 5th U. S. artillery, 23 Feb., 1866, and by regular promotion became 1st lieutenant in January, 1867, and captain, 9 Dec., 1887. From 1872 till 1876 he was on duty at the Massachusetts institute of technology as professor of military science. He was graduated at the Artillery school, Fort Monroe, Va., 1 May, 1880, and at the school of submarine mining, Willet's point, N. Y., in July of the same year. Capt. Zalinski's name is widely known in connection with the development of the pneumatic dynamite torpedo-gun. (See vignette.) He has invented the electrical fuse and other devices for the practical application of the weapon, and has also devised a method for the exact sight-allowance to be made for deviation due to wind in the use of rifled artillery and small-arms. His other inventions include an intrenching-tool, a ramrod-bayonet, and a telescopic sight for artillery.

ZAMBRANA, Ramón (thahm-brah'-nah). Cuban physician, b. in Havana in 1817; d. there in 1866. He studied medicine in the university of his native city, where he was graduated as licentiate in surgery in 1839, in 1843 as licentiate in medicine, and in 1846 as doctor. He filled successively in the University of Havana and the San Carlos seminary the chairs of chemistry, natural philosophy, anatomy, physiology, legal medicine, and toxicology. He was a member of several scientific and literary bodies, one of the founders of the Academy of medicine and natural sciences of Havana, and, took part in several scientific commissions. He divided his time between the duties of his profession, his chair in the university, and literary and scientific pursuits. In 1841 he founded the "Repertorio Médico Habanero," the first publication of its kind in Cuba, and in 1848 he founded the "Repertorio de Medicina Farmacia y Ciencias Naturales." He published "Pronuario Médico Quirúrgico" (Havana, 1850); "Revista Médica de la Isla de Cuba" (1851); "Obras Literarias y Científicas" (1858); "Diversas épocas de la poesía en Cuba" (1861); "Tratado de Historia Natural" (1863); "Mis Creencias" (1864); "Trabajos Académicos" (1865); and "Soliloquio" (1866). Dr. Zambrana left a manuscript history of philosophy, which has never been published.

ZAMNÁ, IZAMNÁ, or IZAMNAT-UL, founder of the empire of Mayapan. He seems to have been of Asiatic extraction, according to many authorities, who claim that the empires of Xibalbay and Mayapan owed their civilization to the Philistines, driven from Palestine by Joshua, who, under the conduct of Gueumatatz, trusted to the sea, and were cast on the shores of Cuba. Thence they migrated to Yucatan and Guatemala, where they conquered the natives, who named them Olmecos and Xicalancos. Such is the theory of Brasseur de Bourbourg in his "Histoire des nations civilisées du Mexique et du Guatemala" (Paris, 1858); of Las Casas in his "Historia Apolog. de las Indias Occidentales" (manuscript); of Ramon de Ordoñez y Aguilar in his "Historia del cielo y de la tierra" (manuscript); of Diego Lopez Cogolludo in his "Historia de Yucatán" (Madrid, 1688), and others. Zamna arrived in Yucatan about the time that Balum-Votan reigned in Xibalbay, heading the emigration of a great people, according to the historians. The natives of Yucatan opposed his progress, but were defeated, and, "having subdued the whole country in a few years, Zamna built Mayapan at the foot of the Mani mountains," according to John L. Stephens in his "Incidents of Travel in Yucatan" (New York, 1858). He next promulgated a code of laws, divided his empire into fifteen provinces, which he made hereditary fiefs for his generals and the members of his family, each holding his province in fee-simple, but sustaining an army for the defence of the empire, and being compelled to own a palace in Mayapan and live there three months every year on penalty of forfeiture. Zamna's reign was a long and glorious one, and he died at a great age. It is believed that he invented the phonetic signs that constituted the Maya system of writing. He was buried in a magnificent temple built for that purpose, underground, between two rocks, which was a resort for pilgrims, and around which was erected a spacious city. This became famous under the name of Izamal, the sacred city: a part of it still exists and is inhabited, while its magnificent ruins are the admiration of the traveller. Zamna was surnamed in the aboriginal language "Itzen-caan," or "Itzen-mayal," which means "The Rose of Heaven." Bernardo Lizana has written the "Historia de Nuestra Señora de Izamal, de la Provincia de Yucatán" (Valladolid, 1633).

ZAMORA, Alonso de (thah-mo'-rah), Colombian historian, b. in Bogota in 1660; d. there about 1725. He entered the Dominican order in early life, and, after finishing his studies in the College of Santo Tomas, passed several years in the southeastern missions, laboring among the Indians of the head-waters of Meta and Guaviare rivers. On his return to Bogota he acquired great fame as a theologian and littérateur, and was appointed examiner of the synod. In this post he made a specialty of the study of Granadan history, and collected numerous rare documents. In 1690 he was appointed historian of his order, and began to write his great work, which was concluded in 1696, under the title "Historia del Nuevo Reino de Granada y de la provincia de San Antonio en la religion de Santo Domingo" (Barcelona, 1701).

ZAMORA, Cristobal de, Spanish missionary, b. about 1500; d. in Tula, Mexico, 16 March, 1566. He entered the Franciscan order, and went in 1530 to Mexico, where he was attached to the missions of the province of Santo Evangelio. He learned the Indian dialects, preached in Toltec and Aztec after 1535, founded several missions, built churches, established schools for the Indians, and founded the convent of Tula, for the support of which he obtained a grant of twelve Indian villages, and established a model farm for their benefit. He held the office of prior of the convent at Tula till his death. He wrote in Toltec a catechism, a manual of prayers, and a history of Christ, which are preserved in the archives at Simancas, and are considered among the best existing monuments of the Toltec language, being remarkable for purity and elegance of style. The state publication, "Cartas de Indias" (Madrid, 1872), contains also several interesting memorials of Zamora on the condition of the Indians in Mexico.

ZANE, Ebenezer, pioneer, b. in Berkeley county, Va., 7 Oct., 1747; d. in Wheeling, Va., in 1811. He was of Danish descent. Zane made the first permanent establishment on Ohio river in 1770, on the present site of Wheeling, and built there a block-house called Fort Henry, from which he repelled several attacks that were made by the Indians during the Revolution, the last assault being in 1781. He was a disbursing officer under Lord Dunmore, held several other civil and military posts, and attained the rank of colonel. He owned the land where the city of Zanesville now stands, on Muskingum river.—His sister, Elizabeth, b. in Berkeley county, Va., about 1759; d. in St. Clairsville, Ohio, about 1847, had returned from Philadelphia, where she had completed her education, to Fort Henry a short time before its siege by the Indians in September, 1777. Among its defenders were her brothers, Ebenezer and Silas. The ammunition in the fort having been exhausted, Ebenezer Zane remembered that there was a keg of powder in his house, sixty yards distant, but the person that should endeavor to secure it would be exposed to the fire of the Indians. Every man in the fort offered to perform the perilous service but at this juncture Elizabeth Zane came forward and asked permission to go for the powder, giving as a reason that her life was of less value to the garrison than that of a man. She was so importunate that a reluctant consent was finally given. She went out of the gate of the fort, fearlessly passed the open space to her brother's house, which she entered, and, having secured the powder, retraced her steps amid a shower of Indian bullets, entering the fort in safety with her valuable prize. She was twice married, and resided at St. Clairsville, Ohio.

ZAPATA, Juan Ortiz de (thah-pah'-tah), Mexican author, b. in Castile about 1620; d. in Chihuahua about 1690. He became a Jesuit, and was attached to the missions of northern Mexico. After learning the Indian dialects he was vicar of the parish of Santa Rosa de Cusihiuriachic, where he labored for about thirty years. He wrote in 1678 a valuable "Relación de las Misiones que la Compañía de Jesus tiene en el Reino y la Provincia de la Nueva Vizcaya," which has appeared in the state publication, "Documentos para la Historia Mexicana" (6 vols., Madrid, 1860). Zapata's work is also mentioned in Father Bernard of Bologne's "Bibliotheca Societatis Jesus" (1715); in the "Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesus" (Pisa, 1729-'45); and in Bancroft's "Native Races" (San Francisco, 1883).

ZAPATA-MENDOZA, Juan Ventura, Mexican author, lived in the 16th century. He belonged to the nobility of the former republic of Tlaxcala, and was cacique of the village of Quiahuitzlan of that state, but in early life had been baptized, and submitted to Spanish rule. He was a man of great learning, and wrote in Aztec a curious chronicle relating the history of his people since their immigration to the plateau of Mexico, under the title of "Crónica de Tlaxcala en Lengua Mexicana, que contiene todos los sucesos de los Tlaxcaltecos desde su arribo al País de Anahuac hasta el año 1589." The original manuscript has not been found in the National library of Mexico, and may perhaps exist in the archives of the Indies in Simancas. Lorenzo Boturini and Francisco J. Clavigero have published extracts from it.

ZAPATA Y SANDOVAL, Juan, Mexican R. C. bishop, b. in the city of Mexico in 1545; d. in Guatemala, 9 Jan., 1630. He entered the order of St. Austin in 1563, was several years professor of philosophy and theology, and in 1602 was called to Spain as director of studies of the College of San Gabriel de Valladolid. In 1613 he was nominated bishop of Chiapa, where he founded a seminary, and in 1621 he was promoted bishop of Guatemala. In that city he laid the foundation for the Monastery of the Conception, and instituted the literary university, and was so prodigal in charities that he died in debt. He wrote "De Justitia distributiva et acceptione personarum ei opposita; Diceptatio pro Novi Indiarum Orbis rerum moderatoribus, summisque regalibus" (Madrid, 1609); "Cartas al Conde de Gomera, Presidente de Guatemala, sobre los Indios de Chiapa"; and "Cartas al Rey sobre la Visita y Estado de la Diócesis de Chiapa." The last two, in manuscript, were used by Father Antonio Remesal in his "Historia de Chiapa y Guatemala" (Madrid, 1619), are now in the archives of the Indies in Simancas, and are to be published in the government collection.

ZAPIOLA, José (thah-pe-o'-lah), Chilean musician, b. in Santiago in 1802; d. there in 1885. He early showed great talent for music, and was sent by his parents in 1824 to Buenos Ayres to study harmony and composition. On his return in 1826 he participated in the campaign of Chiloe as band-master of the 7th regiment, and in 1830, on the arrival of the first operatic company in Chili, whose orchestra-leader had died, Zapiola was called to occupy his place, and soon acquired fame, so that he was called repeatedly to Lima to lead the orchestra of the opera there. In 1852 he was appointed director of the newly founded conservatory of music at Santiago, where he educated many artists, and he may be called the creator of the musical art in Chili. He founded in 1853 the weekly "El Semanario Musical," was co-editor of the "Estrella de Chile," and in 1864 was appointed director of the choir of the cathedral, which post he held till his death. His best musical compositions are "Domine ad adjuvandum me" (1835); a "Requiem" (1836); "Himno al triunfo de Yungay" (1840); and "Himno á San Martín" (1842); and he wrote also a book of historical incidents and sketches of Chilean customs, "Recuerdos de treinta años" (2 vols., Santiago, 1872-'6).

ZARAGOZA, Ignacio (thah-rah-go'-tah), Mexican soldier, b. on the Bay of Espiritu Santo, Tex., 24 March, 1829; d. in Puebla, Mexico, 8 Sept., 1862. His ancestors were Indians, and he received his primary education in Matamoros, completing his studies in the Seminary of Monterey. He devoted himself for some time to commerce in that city, then entered the national guard, in which he was elected sergeant, and when Santa-Anna created an active militia in 1853, marched to Tamaulipas as captain of a company. He pronounced in favor of the Liberal party in May, 1855, assisted in the victory of Saltillo over Santa-Anna's forces, and was promoted colonel. After the fall of Ignacio Comonfort, Zaragoza joined the forces that opposed the reactionary government of Zuloaga and Miramon, took part in the whole campaign, being promoted brigadier, and during the absence of the general-in-chief, Gonzalez Ortega, commanded the defence of Guadaluajara in November, 1860, taking a principal part in the final victory of Calpulalpam, 23 Dec., 1860. Under the government of Juarez he was secretary of war from April till October, 1861, and during the French intervention he volunteered for active service, joining the eastern army under Gen. Uruga, of which soon afterward he was appointed commander, with rank of major-general. He first met the French army at Acultzingo, 28 April, 1862, and retired before superior forces to Puebla, where he fortified the hills of Guadalupe and Loreto temporarily, and with 5,000 raw soldiers awaited the attack of the disciplined French army under Gen. Laurencez. On 5 May the French commander, despising the small and badly equipped Mexican force, tried to carry the hills by storm, but was thrice repelled, and with a shattered army retired to Orizava. Zaragoza afterward marched against Orizava, in combination with Gonzalez Ortega, but the surprise of the latter's division at Cerro del Borrego forced him to retire to Puebla, where he was preparing his army for defence against French re-enforcements, when he died of typhus fever. The anniversary of his defence of Puebla is celebrated as a national holiday; his name was inscribed in gold letters in the chamber of congress, and the full pay of his grade was voted to his family, while the city that he defended bears officially the name of Puebla de Zaragoza.

ZÁRATE, Agostin de (thah'-rah-tay), Spanish historian, b. in Andalusia about 1493; d. in Madrid about 1460. He was appointed in 1528 secretary of the council of Castile and comptroller of the province, and in 1543 was promoted treasurer-general of the Indies and Tierra firme, and sent to Peru to examine the accounts of the viceroyalty, and to endeavor to restore the revenues of Spain, which had greatly fallen off since the rebellion of the younger Almagro. Sailing from San Lucar, 3 Nov., 1543, with the newly appointed viceroy, Blasco Nuñez de Vela, he took an important part in the civil war that raged in Peru, and after Nuñez's deposition was despatched by the audiencia with Antonio de Rivera on an embassy to Gonzalo Pizarro, who was marching against Lima. Zarate urged the latter to dismiss his troops, and before Pizarro's council pleaded for the safety of Lima, which most of the officers were talking openly of pillaging. He was sent back to the audiencia with Pizarro's propositions, and throughout the difficult negotiations that followed displayed remarkable ability and acuteness. He employed the remainder of his sojourn in Peru in collecting documents about the history of the conquest and civil war, but met with difficulties, as some of Pizarro's lieutenants had an interest in the suppression of all such papers. On his return to Europe he became treasurer of the government of the low countries at Brussels, which office he filled till shortly before his death. He wrote "Historia del Descubrimiento y Conquista del Perú" (Antwerp, 1555; Seville, 1577), which was translated into French (2 vols., Paris and Amsterdam, 1700), and into Italian (2 vols., Verona, 1698), etc. It extends from the discovery of Peru till the government of Pedro de la Gasca.

ZÁRATE, Gerónimo, Mexican historian, lived in the 17th century. He entered the Franciscan order in the city of Mexico, and accompanied as chaplain the various expeditions to New Mexico that were sent by the viceroys Luis de Velasco and Count de Monterey. He wrote "Relación de un Viaje al Nuevo México," dated 1617; "Relación de las Expediciones al Nuevo México, remitida al General del Orden de San Francisco en 1624"; and "Relación de todas las cosas que se han visto y sabido en el Nuevo México, así por mar como por tierra, desde el año 1538 hasta 1626" (13 small volumes). The manuscripts of all these works were in the Franciscan archives in Mexico, but have been transferred to the National library. The last-mentioned is specially noteworthy, as it gives an account of all the expeditions that had been sent to the north before the author's time.

ZÁRATE, Miguel, Spanish educator, b. in the province of Alava in the beginning of the 16th century; d. in Puebla, Mexico, in 1583. He entered the Franciscan order in his native province, and about 1525 went to Mexico, where he was professor of philosophy and theology in the College of Santa Cruz de Tlaltelolco. In a short time he became so proficient in Aztec that he was appointed professor of that language, and taught many scholars, among whom was the famous Father Juan Bautista. He was also an efficient missionary, greatly beloved by the natives, and became superior of the convent of Puebla, in which post he died, leaving many interesting manuscripts, which were first preserved in the archives of the College of San Buenaventura, but are now in the National library in the city of Mexico. They include "Noticias interesantes á la Historia civil y eclesiástica de Mexico" and "Opúsculos doctrinales y morales en Lengua Mexicana." Agustin Betancourt and Leon Pinelo mention them and give frequent extracts from his history.

ZÁRATE, Pedro Ortiz de, Spanish judge, b. in Segovia about 1490; d. in Lima, Peru, in 1545. He was grand provost of Segovia, when he was appointed, in 1543, one of the four auditors to found the audiencia of Lima, and accompanied the new viceroy, Blasco Nuñez de Vela, but soon came in collision with the latter, who solicited Zarate's recall on the ground that he was a poor Latin scholar. When Nuñez gave orders to seize and carry on board a man-of-war the nephews of Gonzalo Pizarro, Zarate opposed the measure, urging that the people disapproved it, as they feared Pizarro's resentment. Nevertheless, when Nuñez was imprisoned by the audiencia, 18 Sept., 1543, Zarate refused to take part in the proceedings, but remained in Lima, and at the entry of Pizarro, 21 Oct., by his influence saved the city from pillage, signing the commission of governor for Pizarro under the protest that he yielded only to force and to the wish to prevent bloodshed. He continued in office after the audiencia was reorganized to the great displeasure of Gonzalo, and checked many abuses. It is said that he was poisoned by some powders that were sent to him by Pizarro, and, though this fact is disputed, it is conceded that the latter showed unmistakable signs of relief when he heard of Zarate's death.

ZARCO, Francisco (thar'-co), Mexican journalist, b. in Durango, 4 Dec., 1829; d. in the city of Mexico, 29 Dec., 1869. He studied in his native city, and after the occupation of the capital by the American forces, 16 Sept., 1847, Luis de la Rosa, the general minister of the Mexican government in Queretaro, appointed him chief clerk. On the evacuation of the capital by the American forces, Zarco became a member of the staff of the paper "El Siglo XIX," and shortly afterward he took the direction of the weekly "La Ilustración," in which he published a series of notable articles on customs, literature, history, and criticism under the pen-name of "Fortun." From 1849 till 1853 he was editor-in-chief of "El Siglo XIX." He also edited a satirical paper, "La Cosquilla," which attacked the administration, and contributed to the fall of the government of Gen. Arista. He was elected a member of congress in 1855, and in the session of 1856 defended the reform laws with enthusiasm. On the accession of Zuloaga he was persecuted by the government, and for more than two years remained concealed, but published "El Boletín Clandestino" and "Los asesinatos de Tacubaya," which were distributed broadcast. Being discovered by the police, 13 May, 1860, he was imprisoned till the fall of the reactionary government, 25 Dec., 1860. Juárez, on his return to the capital, appointed him secretary of state and president of the council. But when congress assembled and the votes of five states, electing him to that body, were declared illegal, he resigned, and returned to the direction of "El Siglo XIX." On the departure of the republican government from Mexico, he followed Juárez, publishing "La Independencia Mexicana" in San Luis Potosí, and "La Acción" in Saltillo. He then went to the United States. After the return of the republican government he was elected to congress for the Federal district. He died poor, notwithstanding he had been financial agent of the government without restriction during the residence of Juárez in Vera Cruz. Congress voted a pension to his family, and inscribed his name in the legislative hall.

ZARCO, Giulio, Italian missionary, b. in Naples in 1490; d. in Jalisco, Mexico, in 1549. He was educated in Spain, entered the Franciscan order, and was among the twelve friars that came to Mexico in 1524 with Martín de Valencia. He learned the Indian languages, and in 1525 was sent to the province of Michoacán with another missionary and the king Catzonzi, whom he had just baptized, and labored there with success, establishing schools for the Indians, and building chapels, churches, hospitals, and a college for the new converts. He became afterward provincial of Jalisco, and met with remarkable success. Zarco was very proficient in Indian dialects, and wrote numerous hymns and prayers in Aztec. He also translated several passages of scripture and composed in Tarasco "Doctrina Cristiana," which is preserved in manuscript in the Vatican library at Rome, and mentioned with praise by several authors. He wrote also "Arte de la lengua Tarasca," which is cited by Ramusio and Ternaux Compans. The manuscript is lost, but an abridged copy of it is in the National library of Paris.

ZAVALA, Lorenzo de (tah-vah'-lah), Mexican statesman, b. in Mérida, Yucatán, 3 Oct., 1788; d. in Harrisburg, Tex., 16 Nov., 1836. He studied in the Seminary of San Ildefonso, in his native city. In 1812 he participated in the revolutionary movement of Yucatán, supporting the junta de San Juan, and founding the first newspaper in the peninsula that defended Liberal principles. In May, 1814, he was arrested and sent to the castle of San Juan de Ulúa, where he remained a prisoner for three years, employing his time in studying medicine and English. In 1820 he was sent as deputy for Yucatán to the Spanish cortes. He returned to Mexico in 1822, was elected to the 1st congress, and soon became a leader. After the fall of the empire under Iturbide he was the chief defender of the Federal cause in the "Águila Mexicana" and in congress, and as president of that body signed the Federal constitution, 4 Oct., 1824. In 1825 he was elected senator for Yucatán in the 1st Constitutional congress, joining the Federal party, and in 1827 he became governor of the state of Mexico. After the accession of Gen. Vicente Guerrero, he was called in 1829 to the portfolio of the treasury. When Guerrero's government was overthrown by Bustamante, Zavala travelled in the United States and Europe. In 1832, after the fall of Bustamante, he returned and was reinstated as governor of the state of Mexico, and toward the end of 1833 he was sent as minister to France, but, on the deposition of Vice-President Gómez Farias, he resigned and went to Texas, where he had extensive property. When the province rose against Mexico, in consequence of the prohibition against selling land to American citizens, Zavala joined the insurgents, who proclaimed the re-establishment of the Federal constitution of 1824, and was sent as deputy for Harrisburg to the convention of Austin, which on 7 Nov., 1835, declared war. He was also a member of the deputation that was sent to Washington which declared the independence of Texas, 2 March, 1836. He was the author of "Ensayo histórico de las Revoluciones de México, desde 1808 hasta 1830" (2 vols., Paris, 1831) and "Viaje á los Estados Unidos de Norte América" (1834).

ZEÁ, Francisco Antonio (thay-ah), Colombian statesman, b. in Medellín, 21 Oct., 1770; d. in Bath, England, 22 Nov., 1822. He acquired his primary education in the Seminary of Popayan, and in 1786 entered the College of San Bartolomé of Bogotá. There he wrote for the "Papel Periódico" his "Hebephilo," inviting young men to the study of nature, and in 1789, when José Celestino, sage Mutis, retired from the academy known as the Expedición botánica, Zea was appointed his successor. In 1794, with Antonio Nariño, he was implicated in the circulation of the "Droits de l'homme," sent to Spain, and for two years kept prisoner in the fortress of Cadiz. Although absolved in 1799, he was sent to France on a scientific mission, as the government desired to keep him away from New Granada. On his return, in 1803, he was still prohibited from returning to his country, and was appointed director of the botanical cabinet of Madrid. He was elected member of several Spanish scientific societies, and was editor of the "Mercurio de España" and "Semanario de Agricultura." In 1808 he espoused the French cause, was appointed chief clerk of the secretary of the interior, and afterward prefect of Málaga. After the retreat of the French from Spain he went to England and by way of Jamaica joined Bolívar in Hayti in 1815. He accompanied the liberator in his expedition to Venezuela in March, 1816, and was appointed general intendant of the army. He was chosen by Bolívar in 1817 a member of the council of state in Angostura, founded with Dr. Roscio the "Correo de Orinoco," and in 1819, when the congress of Angostura met, he was elected its president. During the absence of Bolívar on his expedition to New Granada, Zea was in charge of the executive as vice-president till he resigned, 14 Sept., 1819, in consequence of the intrigues of Gen. Arismendi. After the proclamation of Colombia as a republic, Bolívar was elected president and Zea vice-president. In 1820 he went as minister to England and France; but his financial negotiations were unfortunate. He was the author of "Las Quinas de Nueva Granada" (Madrid, 1805); "Descripción del Salto de Tequendama" (1806); and "Historia de Colombia" (Paris, 1821).

ZEILIN, Jacob, officer of marines, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 July, 1806; d. in Washington, D. C., 18 Nov., 1880. He entered the marine corps and was commissioned a 2d lieutenant, 1 Oct., 1831, promoted to 1st lieutenant, 12 Sept., 1836, and cruised in the "Columbus" and "Congress" in 1845-'8 during the Mexican war. He participated in the operations on the Pacific coast and in defence of Monterey, 15 July, 1846, was transferred to command the marines in the frigate "Congress," and took part with Com. Robert F. Stockton in the conquest of California. He was brevetted major for gallantry in the action at crossing San Gabriel river, 9 Jan.,

1847, and took part in the capture of Los Angeles and in the battle of La Mesa. He was military commandant at San Diego in 1847, and participated in the capture of Guaymas in September, 1847, and in the action at San Jose, 30 Sept., 1847. During October, 1847, and till the end of the war, he was at Mazatlan, where he took part in frequent skirmishes with the Mexicans, who had been obliged to evacuate the city. He was commissioned captain, 14 Sept., 1847, and served at New York in 1849, and in Norfolk, Va., in 1849-'52. He was fleet marine-officer in the flag-ship "Mississippi," in Com. Matthew C. Perry's expedition to Japan in 1852-'4, and commanded the battalion of marines at the landing on 14 July, 1853. He was stationed at Norfolk in 1854-'7, and at Washington in 1857, and there commanded the first company of marines which quelled the riot of Baltimore roughs, 1 June, 1857. When the civil war began he took command of the right company in the marine battalion in co-operation with the army in 1861, participated in the battle of Bull Run on 21 July, and was slightly wounded. He was commissioned major in the marine corps, 26 July, 1861, was commandant at New York barracks in 1862-'3, and in August, 1863, had command of the marine battalion that sailed from New York and landed on Morris island, Charleston harbor, to participate in the operations of the South Atlantic blockading squadron under Admiral Dahlgren. In March, 1864, he returned to the north and took command of the marine barracks at Portsmouth, N. H. He was appointed colonel commandant of the marine corps, 10 June, 1864, and assumed control at headquarters at Washington, D. C. He was commissioned brigadier-general commandant, 2 March, 1867. Gen. Zeilin was retired on account of age and long and faithful service, 1 Nov., 1876.

ZEISBERGER, David, missionary, b. in Zauchenthal, Moravia, 11 April, 1721; d. in Goshen, Ohio, 17 Nov., 1808. In 1740 he emigrated to Georgia, where his church was organizing a mission among the Creeks. Thence he was sent to Pennsylvania, where he assisted in the building of Nazareth and Bethlehem. Preparatory to entering the mission service in 1743, he became a student in the Indian school at Bethlehem, where he was instructed in the Delaware and Onondaga languages. Later, he continued the study of the latter at the capital of the Five Nations. In addition to these languages he was conversant with Mohican, Monsey-Delaware, and Chippewa. From 1745 till 1750 he was employed at Shamokin and Onondaga, and in the latter year he visited Europe in behalf of the mission. In 1752 he returned to Onondaga, but was compelled to retire to Bethlehem at the opening of the French and Indian war. Between 1755 and 1762 he visited North Carolina and the New England provinces, labored among the Indians of Connecticut, and also acted as interpreter for Pennsylvania in their treaty with Teedyuscung and his allies. During the Pontiac war he took charge of the Moravian Indians, and after the peace accompanied them to Wyalusing, Bradford co., Pa. In 1767 he established a mission among the Monsey-Delawares on Alleghany river, and three years later he began Friedenstadt, on the Beaver. His first visit to Ohio was made in 1771, and a year later he organized the mission on the Muskingum, where he was joined by the converts from Pennsylvania. Early in the Revolution the Delawares were accused of favoring the American side, and the converts were forced to leave their towns and come within the British lines. After being moved from place to place they were finally settled on Thames river in Canada. In 1798, Zeisberger, with a few converts, left Canada and founded Goshen, Ohio, where he passed the remaining ten years of his life. He published a "Delaware and English Spelling-Book" (Philadelphia, 1776); "A Collection of Hymns for the Christian Indians" (1803); and "Sermons for Children" (1803). Of his voluminous manuscripts there has been published "Dictionary in German and Delaware" (Cambridge, 1887), and "Essay toward an Onondaga Grammar" (Philadelphia, 1888). The most important unpublished manuscripts are "German and Onondaga Lexicon" (7 vols.), two Delaware Indian grammars, and collections of hymns and sermons. See "Life and Times of David Zeisberger," by Bishop Edmund de Schweinitz (Philadelphia, 1870), and "Diary of David Zeisberger, 1781-'98" (Cincinnati, 1888).

ZELL, Bernhard (thell), Flemish explorer, b. in Luxemburg in 1715; d. there in 1779. He was apprenticed at Bremen, and lived in New Orleans from 1740 till 1759, where he founded a German mercantile house, and, having acquired a fortune, he visited Florida. After the cession of Louisiana to Spain he obtained permission to travel through Mexico, and made an exploration of California and Texas among difficulties of all kinds. In studying the geology of California he came to the conclusion that the country possessed gold-mines, and addressed a memoir to the Marquis de Croix, viceroy of Mexico; but little attention was paid to it, as explorations sent in former centuries to search for gold in California had utterly failed. The viceroy gave him permission to organize an expedition; but, as he refused further support, Zell returned in 1770 to his native city, where he died. He wrote "Reisen im Innern von Neu Spanien und Californien," containing an analysis of the soil of several districts of Mexico and California, from which the author concluded that California is a mining country (2 vols., Luxemburg, 1771-'2), and "Land und Leute der Spanisch-Amerikanischen Colonien" (2 vols., 1778).

ZENDEJAS, Miguel Gerónimo (thaynday'-has), Mexican artist, b. in Puebla in 1724; d. there in 1816. He came of a poor family, and probably would have died in obscurity and ignorance notwithstanding his natural talent for drawing; but Bishop Antonio J. Perez, at that time secretary of Bishop Bienpica, saw a rough painting by Zendejas, and, discovering an extraordinary gift in the poor artist, caused him to receive lessons by well-known masters. He was then too old to acquire the rudimentary principles of drawing, and always adhered to his former custom of not making any outline sketch of his figures, but, unrolling the cloth gradually, began his paintings from the top and finished every detail thoroughly before he painted the lower parts. Therefore some of his outlines are defective; but his genius gave him such facility of composition and such rich, soft coloring to his works, that his numerous paintings are esteemed highly among the artistic gems of Mexico. They are preserved for the greater part in his native city, which he never left. His best work is a "Calvary" in the cathedral of Puebla.

ZENDER, Joachim Denis Laurent, physician, b. in Paris, 22 Nov., 1805. He received his education in the College Louis-le-Grand, studied theology in the Seminary of St. Sulpice, and in 1837 joining the order of the Foreign missions, came to this country as a missionary in 1828. After teaching humanities in several Roman Catholic colleges in Missouri and Maryland, he left the church in 1832, studied medicine in New York, obtained his diploma in 1842, and in 1844 was ordained in the latter city as a Protestant minister of the Congregational church, and gathered a small French congregation. Later he devoted himself to scientific works, and also travelled through the country, conducting revivals. He published "Anthroponomy, or Magneto-Physiognomico Craniology: A New System on the Magnetic Constitution of Man" (Philadelphia, 1843; revised ed., New York, 1850); "Abécédaire Français-Anglais illustré, suivi d'un vocabulaire pittoresque" (1853); and "Guide des États-Unis, pour les chemins de fer, la navigation, les lois et les constitutions de l'Amérique du Nord" (1858). From 1848 till 1868 Mr. Zender edited yearly the "Almanach et Directoire des Français aux États-Unis," a French business directory for the United States, and he also published at intervals between 1845 and 1865 several large phrenological charts in Spanish, English, and French.

ZENEA, Juan Clemente (thay-nay'-ah), Cuban author, b. in Bayamo in 1834; d. in Havana, 25 Aug., 1871. When he was very young he went to Havana, where he received his education, and then devoted himself to teaching and literary pursuits. His liberal ideas forced him to emigrate several times, fixing his residence alternately in the United States and Mexico, with short sojourns at Havana. In 1861 he founded the "Revista Habanera," which was suppressed by the government after two years of existence. When the Cuban insurrection began in 1868 he went to New York, where he published a newspaper in aid of the Cuban patriots. In 1870 he was sent to Cuba by the revolutionary committee of New York on a special mission to President Céspedes. When he was attempting to leave the island, after fulfilling his mission, he was made a prisoner by the Spanish forces, confined several months in Fort Cabañas, of Havana, and finally court-martialed and shot. Zenea enjoys a wide reputation as a lyrical poet in all Spanish-speaking countries, and his poems have been frequently reprinted. He published "Cantos de la Tarde" (Havana, 1860); "Lejos de la patria," a novel (1861); "En días de esclavitud" (New York, 1870); and "Diario de un Mártir," written in his prison. A complete edition of Zenea's poems was published in New York (1872).

ZENGER, John Peter, printer, b. in Germany about 1680; d. in New York city in 1746. He came to this country about 1700, and was an apprentice in the printing-office of William Bradford the elder. On 5 Nov., 1733, he began the publication of the "New York Weekly Journal." This paper was the organ of the party that was opposed to the governor of the province, and was powerfully supported by Chief-Justice Lewis Morris, Rip Van Dam, and James Alexander. It abounded in lampoons and pasquinades that attracted wide attention, and attacked the government with severity, contributing greatly toward loosening the bonds between England and the colonies. On 17 Nov., 1734, Zenger was arrested and imprisoned by virtue of a warrant from Gov. William Cosby and the council for "printing and publishing several seditious libels." The house of assembly refused to concur with the governor, and he ordered the mayor to burn the papers containing the alleged libels by aid of the hangman. The order was obeyed, but by the sheriff's servant, not the hangman, and the jury failing to find an indictment against Zenger, the attorney-general was directed to file an information against him for the said libels at the next term of the court. His political friends employed Andrew Hamilton, of Philadelphia, to plead his cause, which proved at the same time to be the question of the liberty of the press in America, and all the central colonies regarded the controversy as their own. (See HAMILTON, ANDREW.) At the trial the publishing was confessed, but Hamilton justified the publication by asserting its truth. "You cannot be permitted," interrupted the chief justice, "to give the truth of a libel in evidence." "Then," said Hamilton to the jury, "we appeal to you for witnesses of the facts. The jury have a right to determine both the law and the fact, and they ought to do so. The question before you is not the cause of a poor printer, nor of New York alone; it is the cause of liberty . . . the liberty of opposing arbitrary power by speaking and writing truth." The jury gave their verdict "not guilty," and Zenger, released from his imprisonment of thirty-five weeks, was received with tumultuous applause by a concourse of people who had assembled to learn the result. This event has been termed "the morning-star of that liberty which subsequently revolutionized America." After his death Zenger's widow and his son John conducted the "Journal" until 1752. A narrative of the trial was published with that of William Owen (Boston, 1765).

ZENO, Nicolo, Venetian navigator, b. in Venice about 1340; d. in Newfoundland about 1391. He was a member of a patrician family in Venice, and about 1375 went at his own expense on a voyage to the northern seas, but was wrecked on what he describes as the island of Frislanda (probably in the Faroe group), and rescued by Zichmin, the chief of a neighboring island, into whose service he entered. He remained with Zichmin for some time, assisted in the conquest of Frislanda, and invited his brother Antonio to join him. They visited Greenland (which they named Engronelanda) and Newfoundland, and in company with fishermen navigated along the coast of North America as far, it is claimed, as Virginia. Nicolo died four years after Antonio's arrival, often sending to a third brother, Carlo, grand-admiral of Venice, accounts of his discoveries. Antonio remained ten years more in the service of Zichmin, and then returned to Venice, where he died about 1405. Zeno wrote an account of his voyages, which he showed to several persons, but his papers were partly burned by Antonio's young grandson, Cate-rino (b. in Venice in 1515). The latter, realizing afterward the value of his grand-uncle's papers, was able, with a few letters that had been sent from Frislanda to Carlo, to compile from them a narrative, which he published under the title "Scoprimento dellas isolas Frislanda, Eslanda, Engronelanda, Estotilanda, et Icaria" (Venice, 1558, with a map of North America dated 1390). The authenticity of the two brothers' discoveries was attacked during the following centuries, and even their existence was doubted, but later researches have proved that Marco Barbaro, in his "Discendenze Patrizie" (Venice, 1526), knew of the existence of Zeno's letters, narrative, and map thirty years before their publication. The Hakluyt society published an English translation, with an introduction and notes, entitled "The Voyages of the Venetian Brothers, Nicolo and Antonio Zeno, to the Northern Seas in the 14th Century, comprising the latest known Accounts of the Lost Colony of Greenland, and of the Northmen in America, before Columbus," translated by Richard Henry Major (London, 1873). Zeno's map of Greenland, Newfoundland, and the northern coast of America is remarkably accurate, and his narrative demonstrates also the existence, more than a century before the time of Columbus, of the remains of the Scandinavian colonies that are mentioned by Adam of Bremen in the 11th century, and by Odericus Vitalis in the 12th century, and whose history was recently written by Karl C. Rafn. See also Placido Zurlo's "Dissertazione intorno ai viaggi e scoperte settentrionali di Nicolo ed Antonio, fratelli Zeni," which includes a copy of the original text and also a chart (Venice, 1808).

ZÉNON DE ROUVROY, Charles Albert (zay-nong), French author, b. in Dreux in 1698; d. in Paris in 1759. He was a member of the Academy of Caen, and frequented the literary salons of the time, among them that of Madame Doublet de Persau, of whom he was secretary for several years. He obtained later an office in the navy and colonial department, and wrote the instructions for the colonial governors. His books include "Lettre sur les colonies Françaises de l'Amérique," an anonymous work, which was widely read and caused much discussion, as the author predicted the capture of the colonies by the English (Amsterdam, 1732); "Mémoire sur la politique des Jésuites dans les pays de l'Amérique" (1735); "Histoire de la compagnie des Indes" (2 vols, 1738); and "Mémoire historique sur la Louisiane et la compagnie du Mississippi" (1743). The last is a very curious work, which contains interesting information about the operations of John Law and the policy of the Mississippi company. The latter caused all available copies of the work to be destroyed, and it is now extremely rare. Zénon also wrote "Discussion succincte sur les opérations de la compagnie des Indes Occidentales" (1751).

ZENTENO, Carlos de Tapia (thayn-tay'-no), Mexican author, b. in the city of Mexico in 1698; d. there about 1770. He studied in Trinity seminary of his native city, where he was graduated in theology and canonical law. After receiving holy orders he was appointed to the parish of Tampamolón, and later was made ecclesiastical judge of the district, but gave his leisure time to the study of the Aztec and Huastec dialects, in which he became proficient. Resigning his parish, he settled in Mexico, where he became secretary of the College of San Pedro and, by competitive examination, professor of Aztec in the university. He wrote "Arte Novísimo de la Lengua Mexicana" (Mexico, 1753); "Noticia de la Lengua Huasteca" (1767); "Apología de la Provincia de la Huasteca, desacreditada por su intemperie"; and dictionaries and catechisms in Aztec and Huastec, the manuscripts of which are preserved in the National library of Mexico. Hubert H. Bancroft, in his "Native Races" (San Francisco, 1883), often refers to Zenteno's works.

ZENTENO, José Ignacio, Chilian soldier, b. in Santiago in 1785; d. there in 1847. Having taken part in the movement for independence, he was forced in 1814, after the defeat of Rancagua, to emigrate to Mendoza, together with other patriots, where, soon after his arrival, he was appointed secretary of the treasury of that province. He formed part of the liberating army, and when Gen. Bernardo O'Higgins was elected supreme director, he appointed Zenteno minister of war, in which post he distinguished himself by his activity. He made the campaigns of 1817 and 1818, taking part in the battles of Cancha Rayada and Maipo. After the latter engagement the government intrusted him with the formation of a naval force, and he laid the foundation of the navy which, under Admiral Cochrane, obtained such glorious results. In 1821, after retiring from the ministry of war, he was appointed political and military governor of Valparaíso, and in 1822 was promoted brigadier. In 1831 he was appointed inspector-general of the army, and from 1833 till 1846 he filled several important offices in the war department. He was also a member of the supreme council of war, the Society of agriculture, and the University of Chili, and was several times elected to congress, serving as vice-president of the chamber of deputies. He was founder and first editor of the "Mercurio" of Valparaíso.

ZEPEDA, Francisco (thay-pay'-dah), Spanish missionary, b. in La Roda, Mancha, about 1525; d. in Guatemala in 1602. He entered the Dominican order in Ocaña, and was soon transferred to the missions in the province of Chiapa, where he became a thorough student and expert in the Indian languages of that province and Guatemala. After being prior of different convents, he was elected provincial in the chapter of 1593, and in the following year became commissary of the Inquisition in Guatemala. To unify the teaching of the Indians in the province, he was commissioned to examine and correct the different grammars that had been written by missionaries in the popular dialects or languages, and from them compiled his "Arte de los Idiomas Chiapense, Zoquense, Caldulense, y Cinacontlano" (Mexico, 1560).

ZÉPHIRIN, Antoine (say-fee-reng), Spanish pilot, b. in Franche-Comté about 1475; d. in Nombre de Dios, Isthmus of Panama, about 1530. He followed the sea, and in early life went to Santo Domingo. Afterward he entered the service of Pedrarias Davila, and was chief pilot in Pascual de Andogoya's expedition in 1522, which discovered San Juan river and brought the first news of Peru. In the following year he sailed as chief pilot in Francisco de Becerra's expedition, which explored the Pacific coast. In 1525 he conducted Francisco Pizarro to Peru, and afterward he made expeditions to Guatemala and along the coast of the Isthmus of Darien, of which he prepared the first chart. Nothing is known of the remainder of his life, except that he died in Nombre de Dios, where he owned extensive lands that had been granted to him by Pedrarias Davila.

ZEQUEIRA, Manuel de (thay-kay-ee'-rah), Cuban author, b. in Havana about 1760; d. there in 1846. He entered the army when very young and sailed to Santo Domingo in 1793, when he took part in the attempts to quell the revolt of the negroes in the French part of the island. In 1813 he went to New Grenada, in 1814 he was appointed governor of the province of Rio Hacha, and he was also governor of Santa Marta in 1815 and of Cartagena in 1816. He was brevetted colonel in 1817, and returned to Havana, where he fixed his residence. He lost his reason in 1821. His first poetical essays were published in 1795 in the "Papel Periódico," of Havana, the first newspaper in Cuba. "América y Apolo," an allegorical work, appeared in 1817, and "Batalla de Cortés en la Laguna," an epic, was published in 1820. The first edition of his "Poems" appeared in New York in 1829, and a larger one was published by his son (Havana, 1852).

ZERRAHN, Carl, musician, b. in Malchow, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, 28 July, 1826. He began the study of music in Rostock at the age of twelve years, and completed his education in Hanover and Berlin. About 1848, with twenty-five others, he organized "The Germania Musical Society" and came to this country, giving concerts in London on their way. They reached New York in September, 1848, and gave successful concerts in New York and Brooklyn, which were followed by others in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and New England. They appeared for five or six years with Jenny Lind, Madame Sonntag, Ole Bull, Thalberg, Alfred Jaell, Camilla Urso, and other artists, disbanding in 1854. In that year Zerrahn became musical director of the Handel and Haydn society of Boston, which post he now holds. From 1866 till 1882 he was conductor of the Harvard musical association. He has conducted the music festivals of the Worcester county musical association every year since 1865, with the exception of 1868, which he spent in Germany, and took part in the New York festivals of 1869 and 1873. He is a member of several musical societies, and has edited two books designed for musical organizations, "The Index" (Boston, 1881) and "The Apograph" (1885).

ZEUNER, Charles, musician, b. in Eisleben, Prussian Saxony, 20 Sept., 1795; d. near Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Nov., 1857. He was baptized as Heinrich Christopher, but seems to have changed his name when he came to the United States in 1824. He settled in Boston, where he became organist of Park street church and of the Handel and Haydn society (1830-'7). In 1854 he removed to Philadelphia, where he held various posts as organist. For several years he showed symptoms of insanity, which, however, were not thought to be serious. On 7 Nov., 1857, he left for West Philadelphia, and on the same day committed suicide. His oratorio, "The Feast of Tabernacles," was published in 1832. He issued also some collections of music, notably "The American Harp" (Boston, 1839) and "Ancient Lyre" (1848).

ZEVALLO Y BALBOA, Miguel (thay-val'-yo), Spanish missionary, d. in Quito about 1595. He joined early the army, and served in the Netherlands and Italy, but entered the Franciscan order and went to South America in 1566. In the convent of his order at Santa Fé de Bogota a lay friar, Juan de Orozco, communicated to him some documents relating to American antiquities, and he was induced to undertake their study. He was afterward attached to the missions of Nicaragua, and in 1576 became librarian of a convent in Quito. After that time he devoted himself to the study of ancient Indian monuments, receiving encouragement from Bishop Pedro de la Peña. In 1586 he finished his "Miscelánea Austral" and dedicated it to the Count de Villar, viceroy of Peru; but the work was not printed till Henry Ternaux-Compans translated it into French and published it in his collection under the title "Histoire du Perou" (Paris, 1840). Zevallo's narrative contradicts in several important particulars that of Garcilaso de la Vega, and contains many details about the early history of Peru which are not found elsewhere. The original manuscript is preserved in the archives at Seville, and a copy is in the National library at Paris.

ZIEGLER, Henry, theologian, b. near Old Fort, Centre co., Pa., 19 Aug., 1816. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1841, and at Gettysburg theological seminary in 1843, and in the latter year was licensed to preach. He was pastor at Selinsgrove, Pa., in 1843-'5, travelling missionary and missionary president of Pittsburg synod in 1845-'50, pastor at Williamsport, Pa., in 1850-'3, agent for the Parent education society, residing at Selinsgrove, Pa., in 1853-'5, pastor at Salona, Pa., in 1855-'8, and professor of theology in Missionary institute, Selinsgrove, Pa., in 1858-'81. Failing health then compelled him to retire from active duties. He received the degree of D. D. in 1860 from Wittenberg college, Springfield, Ohio. Dr. Ziegler has a wide reputation as an author, and as a teacher of theology he has been eminently successful. Before his health failed he was a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his church, especially the "Evangelical Review and Lutheran Quarterly" and the "Lutheran Observer." Besides numerous baccalaureate and other addresses, he has published "Treatise on Natural Theology" (1860); "Treatise on Apologetic Theology" (1861); "Catechetics—Historical, Theoretical, and Practical" (Philadelphia, 1873); "The Pastor, his Relation to Christ and the Church" (1876); "The Preacher, his Relation to the Study and the Pulpit" (1876); "Dogmatic Theology" (Selinsgrove, Pa., 1878); and "The Value to the Lutheran Church of her Confessions: An Essay" (Philadelphia, 1878).

ZILLIOX, James, R. C. prelate, b. in Newark, N. J., 14 Oct., 1849. He was educated at St. Vincent's college, Westmoreland co., Pa. and on completing his course, entered the Benedictine order in 1865. After studying theology he was ordained priest on 27 July, 1873, and took the degree of D. D. at the university in Rome on 6 Aug., 1875. On his return to the United States he was called to fill the chair of theology in St. Vincent's college, which he held for several years, also filling the office of master of novices and that of prior of the monastery. In 1885 he was elected abbot of the newly established abbey at St. Mary's church in Newark, N. J., which place failing health compelled him to resign a year later. He is the author of "Album Benedictinum" (Beatty, 1880).

ZINZENDORF, Nicholas Lewis, Count of, b. in Dresden, Saxony, 26 May, 1700; d. in Herrnhut, 9 May, 1760. He was educated at Halle and Wittenberg. In 1722 he conceived the idea of a purer church discipline, marks of which he observed among the descendants of the Unitas Fratrum of Bohemia and Moravia, whom he permitted to settle on his estate, and Herrnhut was built for these refugees. He finally united with them, and in 1736 was consecrated one of their bishops. John Wesley was indebted to him both for his religious organizations and his missionary plans. In behalf of his church, the count visited England and travelled extensively in Europe, and sent out missionaries to all parts of the world. His first visit to the Western continent was in 1739, to inspect the mission organized among the negroes in the West Indies. In December, 1741, he arrived at New York, and later went to Philadelphia. He visited the Moravian tract on the Lehigh, in Pennsylvania, and gave the name of Bethlehem to the new settlement. The first six months of 1742 cover the period of his most varied activity during his sojourn in Pennsylvania. Besides conducting the deliberations of seven religious convocations, he preached steadily in the Lutheran and Reformed churches, travelled through the rural districts, supplying destitute and isolated neighborhoods with the gospel and the means of education, organized churches, wrote many papers and essays—some theological, others controversial and apologetical—and carried on a large correspondence with friends in England and on the continent. During July and August, 1742, he visited among the Delawares of Pennsylvania and the Mohicans of New York and Connecticut, and in September among the Indians on the north and west branches of the Susquehanna, preaching the gospel and organizing missions. He returned to Europe in January, 1743. For a list of Zinzendorf's writings see "Verzeichniss der Schriften des Grafen Ludwig von Zinzendorf" (Stettin, 1824). See also August Gottlieb Spangenberg's "Life of Zinzendorf" (8 vols., Barby, 1772-'5; English translation, London, 1838); "Notices of Count Zinzendorf," by Abraham Ritter (Philadelphia, 1857); and "Moravian Life and Character," by James Henry (Philadelphia, 1859).

ZOGBAUM, Rufus Fairchild, artist, b. in Charleston, S. C., 28 Aug., 1849. He received his art education at the Art students' league, New York, in 1878-'9, and during 1880-'2 under Léon J. F. Bonnat in Paris. He has studied many of the great armies of Europe in field and garrison, and is known as a delineator of military subjects. He is a member of the American water-color society. In 1884 there appeared in "Harper's Monthly" the first of a series of military articles written and illustrated by himself, and he has since published "Horse, Foot, and Dragoons" (New York, 1887).

ZOLLIFFER, Felix Kirk, soldier, b. in Maury county, Tenn., 19 May, 1812; d. near Mill Springs, Ky., 19 Jan., 1862. George, his grandfather, was a captain in the Revolutionary army.

F. K. Zollicoffer

ville, Ala. He began at this time to write for public journals, and one of his prose fancies may be found in Field's "Scrap-Book." From Huntsville he removed to Columbia, Tenn., and took

The family came to this country from Switzerland, and is of ancestry that was ennobled by Rodolphus II. in 1528. Felix K. received a common-school education, learned the printer's trade, and for about a year published a weekly newspaper at Paris, Tenn. He subsequently worked as a printer in Knoxville, Tenn., and Hunts-editorial charge of the "Observer." He served as a soldier, and afterward as a commissioned officer, in the Seminole war, and, returning in 1837, resumed the "Observer" and edited it in the canvass of 1840 in the interest of the Whig candidate. He published and edited also a weekly agricultural paper. In 1841 he became associate editor of the Nashville "Banner," the organ of the Whig party in Tennessee. He was elected comptroller of the state in 1844, and resigned in 1849. In August of the latter year he was elected a state senator. He was chosen to congress in April, 1853, and served continuously for three terms, attaining reputation as an able debater. He retired from public life in 1859, but was chosen as a delegate to the peace conference of 1861. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate service with the rank of brigadier-general, 9 July, 1861. When the National army was about to enter east Tennessee by way of Cumberland Gap, Gen. Zollicoffer, with 2,000 men, went by way of Knoxville to the point of threatened attack. Soon after he had established his camp near Mill Springs, on Cumberland river, Gen. George B. Crittenden arrived and assumed command. In the battle that ensued (see THOMAS, GEORGE H.), Gen. Zollicoffer, having ordered an advance, rode forward with several of his staff officers to inspect the enemy's position, and passed by mistake beyond their lines. He endeavored to retrace his route, and was soon in front of the 4th Kentucky regiment, commanded by Col. Speed S. Fry, with whom he exchanged salutes, and rode off undetected (as he wore an oil-cloth overcoat). But one of his staff fired a pistol toward the National line, which was at once answered by a volley that killed Gen. Zollicoffer and two other officers. Another account represents that Gen. Zollicoffer was shot by Col. Speed S. Fry.

ZOOK, Samuel Kosciuzko, soldier, b. in Pennsylvania about 1823; d. in Gettysburg, Pa., 2 July, 1863. He learned the telegraph business early in life, and made several discoveries in electric science that gave him reputation. He settled in New York about 1848, became connected with several military organizations, and in 1857 lieutenant-colonel of the 6th New York militia. His health had failed, but at the beginning of the civil war he accompanied his regiment to the seat of hostilities, and was appointed military governor of Annapolis, Md. After his return he recruited the 57th regiment of New York volunteers, was commissioned colonel, and led it to the Virginia peninsula. During that campaign he generally commanded a brigade, and on 29 Nov., 1862, he became brigadier-general of volunteers. He led the 57th New York regiment at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, and was killed in the latter battle.

ZORRILLA, Francisco (thor-ril'-yah), Spanish administrator, b. in Murcia about 1490; d. in Santiago, Guatemala, in 1546. He was a knight of the order of Santiago, and, after serving as chief clerk in the office of the council of the Indies, was promoted treasurer of the city of Santiago de Guatemala, and sailed with Pedro de Alvarado, arriving in 1530. He became regidor of Santiago in 1534, and, during the absence of Alvarado, in 1540 was appointed a member of the council of government, which elected Beatriz de la Cueva regent. After the death of the latter, 11 Sept., 1541, Zorrilla assisted Bishop Francisco Marroquin in the government of Santiago and in rebuilding the city, which had been totally destroyed by volcanic eruptions, in which Doña Beatriz perished. Zorrilla left a valuable manuscript, which is preserved in the archives of the Indies at Seville and which is soon to be published by the Spanish government. It is entitled "Historia del descubrimiento, de la conquista, y de la administración de la provincia de Santiago de Guatemala." The recent state publication, "Cartas de Indias" (Madrid, 1872), contains also several interesting memoirs of Zorrilla upon the administration of Pedro de Alvarado, the Indians of Guatemala, and the intestine divisions among the early conquerors.

ZORRILLA Y MORAL, José, Spanish poet, b. in Valladolid, 21 Feb., 1817. He studied law in Toledo and Valladolid, and became clerk to a justice of the peace in the latter city; but he soon devoted himself exclusively to literature. His father, an attorney of reputation, being displeased with his occupation, sent him home; but young Jose made his way to Madrid, where he remained hidden for several weeks. On 15 Feb., 1837, at the funeral of the noted poet Larra, he repeated an elegy which was universally praised, and this was the means of effecting a reconciliation with his father. Zorrilla published, a few months later, his first volume of poetry, which increased his reputation. After 1845 he resided partly in Paris and partly in Brussels till about 1851, when he went to Mexico and was director of the theatre in the city of Mexico in 1853-'5. He wrote several comedies there, which were represented in Mexico and in South America with great success. In 1863 he returned to Mexico, was given an employment in Emperor Maximilian's household, and published several poems in praise of the emperor and his wife, which were severely criticised by the patriots and engaged their author in a controversy with a Mexican poet. He left Mexico in 1865 for Spain, where he has since partly resided. Zorrilla's works include "Cantos del travador, colección de leyendas y tradiciones históricas" (3 vols., Madrid, 1841); "Flores Perdidas" (1843); "El Zapatero y el rey," which is considered his best comedy (1844); "Granada," a long romantic poem, imitated from Victor Hugo, which is considered his masterpiece (2 vols., Paris, 1853-'4); "Album de un loco" (Madrid, 1867); and "Poema religioso" (1869). Complete editions of his works have been published several times (2 vols., Paris, 1847; 3 vols., 1853; 6 vols., Madrid, 1877).

ZUAZO, Alonso (thoo-ah'-tho), Spanish jurist, b. in Olmedo in 1466; d. in Santo Domingo in 1527. He was canon of Valladolid and well known for his erudition, when he was attached as jurist to the commission that was sent by Cardinal Ximenes to the New World at the solicitation of Bishop Las Casas. Zuazo's instructions gave him the power of organizing justice in the West Indies, and appointing judges at his own discretion. After liberating the Indians in Santo Domingo that had been reduced to slavery by the Spanish officials, Zuazo advised the commissioners to oppose Las Casas's schemes of prohibiting forced labor entirely, and thus won the support of the settlers, while Las Casas denounced him to the court. Zuazo befriended both the Indians and settlers, while he was opposed by the officials. After Ximenes had surrendered the regency to Charles V., Zuazo was sent to Cuba in 1518 to organize the administration of justice there. At Diego Velazquez's advice, he went afterward to Mexico to settle the quarrel between Garay and Cortes concerning the government of Panuco, and was well received by Cortes. In 1523 he returned to Cuba, and two years later was appointed auditor of the audiencia of Santo Domingo, which post he retained till his death. An interesting memoir of Zuazo on the condition of the Indians in Santo Domingo and Cuba, written from Cuba in 1521, was published by Joaquin Garcia Icazbalceta in his "Colección de Documentos para la Historia de México" (Mexico, 1858-'66), and another in which Zuazo recounts the cruelties of the Spaniards in Santo Domingo and Cuba, is mentioned by Icazbalceta.

ZUBLY, John Joachim, clergyman, b. in St. Gall, Switzerland, in 1725; d. in Savannah, Ga., 23 July, 1781. It is not known when he came to this country, but in the early records of the Independent Presbyterian church in Savannah the following entry appears: "On the 25th of April, 1758, Mr. Zubly was called to Savannah from Wando Neck, S. C., and accepted the call, preaching his farewell sermon, 28 Jan., 1759, in the Independent Presbyterian church in Charles Town [sic]. He took charge of the Independent Presbyterian church in Savannah the following year, 1760, being the first regular pastor." He was a man of marked ability and learning, and in 1770 received from Princeton the degree of D. D. In 1774 he was a delegate to the Continental congress, and was there selected to prepare a petition to the king "upon the present unhappy situation of affairs." He served also as member of the committee of correspondence for Georgia. He wrote an emphatic letter to Lord Dartmouth, 3 Sept., 1775, with reference to Lord Dunmore's attempt to incite the negroes in Virginia to insurrection. He co-operated zealously with the popular party until it became evident that congress was about to declare the independence of the United States. He declared in congress that "a republic was little better than a government of devils." Presently he opened a correspondence with Sir James Wright, royal governor of Georgia, in which he betrayed the plans of the popular party. His conduct and language exciting suspicion, he was closely watched, and one of his letters was seized. These facts were mentioned in congress by Samuel Chase, whereat Dr. Zubly fled from Philadelphia and returned to Georgia, where he threw off all disguise and made common cause with the Tories. In 1777 he was banished from Savannah with the loss of half his estate. He then remained with Tory friends in South Carolina until Sir James Wright was reinstated in the government of Georgia. Dr. Zubly then returned to his pastoral work in Savannah, and remained there until his death. He has left his name upon Joachim street and Zubly street in Savannah, and upon the hamlet of St. Gall. See William B. Stevens's "History of Georgia" (vol. ii., p. 121, New York, 1859), and Charles C. Jones's "History of Georgia" (vol. ii., pp. 188-204, Boston, 1883). The letter to Lord Dartmouth was published, at the request of Gen. James Oglethorpe, in the "London Magazine" for January, 1776.

ZULOAGA, Félix, president of Mexico, b. in Alamos, Chihuahua, in 1814; d. in the city of Mexico in 1876. In his twentieth year he entered the national guard as lieutenant, and served until 1837 on the frontier against the Apaches, entering the engineer corps the same year. He served during the riots of July, 1840, and against the secessionists of Yucatan in 1842-'3, and in the latter year was promoted lieutenant-colonel. During the preparations for the war against the United States he directed the construction of the defences of Monterey and Saltillo, and in 1847 fortified the southern approaches to the capital. In 1848 he retired to Chihuahua, but in 1853 was recalled to active service, promoted colonel, made president of the perpetual court-martial, and sent to the south against the revolution of Ayutla in 1854, as commander of a brigade. He was forced to capitulate at Nuxco in 1855, but Comonfort saved him from being shot, keeping him on his staff, and after the triumph of the Liberal party Zuloaga was sent to pacify the mountaineers of Queretaro, and served in the two sieges of Puebla. His former affiliation with the Conservative and Church party caused him to conspire against the Liberal government, and on 17 Dec., 1857, he pronounced with his brigade in Tacubaya against the new constitution, and for investing Comonfort with extraordinary powers. The latter wavered for a long time between the two parties, and on 11 Jan., 1858, Zuloaga's brigade, under command of Gen. Parra, occupied the principal points of the capital, proclaiming that Comonfort was deposed and that Zuloaga was president in his stead. He took possession of the executive on 23 Jan., all the reactionary chiefs flocked round him, and the bloody so-called "war of reform" soon began, the Liberals under Juarez opposing the Church party, which proclaimed, under the banner of "religion and special legislation for the church and military," the abolishment of the reform laws, and received secret but strong support from the Spanish government. Zuloaga despatched forces under Miramon, Osollo, and other chiefs against the former; but he found opposition in his own party. In December, 1858, the garrison rose against him, and on the 23d of that month he was deposed and took refuge in the British legation. The provisional president that was elected by the representative junta, Gen. Miramon, on his return from the campaign of the interior, 21 Jan., 1859, declared the deposition of Zuloaga illegal, and reinstated him; but the latter resigned and appointed Miramon his substitute, delivering the executive on 2 Feb. Several times afterward he seemed inclined to resume his place at the head of the government, and he was forced to accompany Miramon nominally as chief of engineers, but in reality as a prisoner. On Miramon's march to Jalisco, Zuloaga escaped from Leon in July, 1860, and immediately issued a manifesto, revoking his resignation of 2 Feb., 1859, and declaring himself constitutional president, and, although he did not find followers, Miramon went to the capital, resigned as substitute, and caused himself to be appointed provisional president by the representative junta. Shortly before the final defeat of the reactionary party, Zuloaga made his peace with Miramon, and was with him in Mexico the day after the battle of Calpulalpam, when the funds in the treasury were divided. Zuloaga then made his way to the mountains to raise partisans, and shortly reappeared at the head of a force to oppose the Liberal government, together with Marquez, Mejia, Negrete, Taboada, and other chiefs. The ex-minister, Melchor Ocampo, was delivered by the guerilla chief, Cajigas, to him and Marquez, and shot at Tepeji, by the orders of one of the two, for which cruel act they were declared outlaws by congress, and a price of $10,000 was set on their heads. On the invasion of the French in 1862, unlike Marquez, Almonte and other reactionary chiefs, he refused to serve the foreigners and retired to Europe, but in August, 1864, he returned and made his submission to the empire without taking any further part in politics.

ZUMARRAGA, Juan de (thoo-mar'-rah-gah), first bishop of Mexico, b. in Durango, Biscay, in 1468; d. in Mexico city in 1548. He entered the Franciscan order at Aranzazu, and was superior of several convents till Charles V. appointed him inquisitor of Biscay. In 1527 he was named first bishop of New Spain, and in 1528 sailed for Mexico as visitor of his order and protector of the Indians. He had difficulties with the first audiencia under Nuño de Guzman, whose cruel measures against the Indians he opposed. After the second audiencia, under the presidency of Sebastian Ramirez de Fuenleal, took charge of the government in 1531, Zumarraga returned to Spain, was consecrated bishop in September, 1534, and sailed soon afterward to Mexico, where he continued to befriend the Indians. He began the construction of the first cathedral, founded the hospitals of Amor de Dios in Mexico and Vera Cruz, and established also a hospital for Franciscan monks. The image of Our Lady of Guadalupe, painted on the Indian cloak, was first seen by him. In 1538 he assembled the first Mexican council, and in 1545 Pope Paul III. raised him to the dignity of metropolitan archbishop of New Spain. He is probably the author of a "Doctrina Cristiana," or catechism (Seville, 1532), which still exists in the Franciscan convent of Texcoco, with his autograph dedication to Friar Toribio Motolinia, who translated it into Aztec. It was the first book that was printed in the New World, on a press and material furnished by the famous printer Juan Cromberger, of Seville, and brought to Mexico by the first viceroy, Antonio de Mendoza (Mexico, 1540). He also wrote several catechisms and other religious works, which were translated into Aztec (Mexico, 1543-'6); "Varias Cartas al Emperador Carlos V."; and "Memorias de la Nueva España," giving noteworthy details about the condition of Mexico soon after the conquest. The letters and history are preserved in manuscript in the archives of the Indies, and will appear in the continuation of the state publication, "Cartas de Indias."

ZUMAYA, Manuel (thoo-mah'-yah), Mexican clergyman, b. in the city of Mexico about 1670; d. in Oaxaca about 1740. He studied theology in the College of San Ildefonso, but early showed a proclivity for music, and was appointed director of the choir of the cathedral in his native city. On account of his dramatic and musical talent, he was a favorite of the viceroys, Dukes of Albuquerque and of Linares, and he translated several Italian operas for representation in the viceregal palace. In 1737 he followed the bishop-elect of Oaxaca to his diocese, where he became rector of the cathedral and devoted himself thenceforth exclusively to his clerical duties. Besides the operas translated from the Italian, he is the author of "El Rodrigo," a drama represented in the viceregal palace to celebrate the birth of the crown-prince Luis (Mexico, 1708), and "La Partenope," an opera, text and music by Zumaya (1711).

ZUNDEL, John, musician, b. in Hochdorf, near Stuttgart, Germany, in 1815; d. in Cannstadt, Germany, in July, 1882. He studied at the Royal academy of Esslingen, Germany, during 1829-'31, and began the study of the violin, but relinquished that instrument for the organ. In 1840 he went to St. Petersburg, and in 1847 came to the United States. He held various posts as organist, notably in Plymouth church, Brooklyn, where he was almost uninterruptedly from 1850 till 1865. In 1865 he went to Europe, remaining two years. After his return he resumed his duties at Plymouth church, but in 1878 went again to Europe. He composed a large number of pieces for the organ, as well as some sacred and vocal music, and published "Modern Organ-School" (Boston, 1860): "The Amateur Organist" (1854): a "Treatise on Harmony and Modulation"; and other books.

ZÚÑIGA, Álvaro Manrique de (thoon'-yegah), Marquis de Villa-Manrique, seventh viceroy of Mexico, b. in Seville, Spain, about 1530; d. in Madrid about 1600. He entered Mexico, 18 Oct., 1585, and one of his first measures was to send reinforcements to Acapulco and fortify that city against English corsairs. He also ordered the arming of a fleet to attack their vessels; but the Licenciado Palacios, who was in command, hearing that Sir Francis Drake had sailed for the East Indies, remained in port and allowed a privateer that was lying in wait at Cape San Lucas to capture the galleon "Santa Ana," with a rich cargo of treasure and silk from Manila. Zuñiga was well liked, both by Spaniards and Indians, whom he treated humanely, but although, according to Torquemada, he was wise and prudent, his hasty temper led him, in a dispute about jurisdiction with the audiencia of Guadalajara, to resort to force, and, as the audiencia armed also, the colony was on the eve of a civil war. His enemies meanwhile spread calumnies at court, and Philip II. in 1589 ordered his relief by Luis de Velasco, and commanded the bishop of Tlaxcala, Pedro Romano, to investigate Zuñiga's government. Romano, who had an old grudge against the viceroy, arrived in Mexico before Velasco, and on 17 Jan., 1590, relieved Zuñiga, going so far, in his enmity toward the latter, as to attach even the clothes of his wife in the seizure of his property. For six years Zuñiga continued in Texcoco, the object of Romano's persecution, till in 1596 he sailed for Spain to seek justice, and obtained at last the reversal of the sentence of confiscation, but he died before he could recover his property.

ZÚÑIGA, Baltasar de, Marquis de Valero, thirty-sixth viceroy of Mexico, b. in Andalusia about 1670; d. in Madrid about 1730. He was appointed in 1716, and on 16 Aug. received the government from his predecessor, the Duke of Linares. Shortly afterward the governor of Texas, Capt. Diego Ramon, sent information that for want of provisions he would have to abandon the territory and retire to Coahuila unless relieved, and Zuñiga at once hurried forward provisions, ammunition, troops, and artisan settlers to teach the Indians. In 1717 a Florida chief, Tixjanaque, who had manifested to the governor of Pensacola a desire to visit the viceroy, arrived in Mexico, and was so well treated by Zuñiga that he accepted baptism and offered the perpetual friendship of his tribe. In the next year the English wood-cutters in Laguna de Terminos, and French settlers in Texas, not having complied with an order of evacuation, were forcibly expelled, and several colonies were founded in Texas. In 1719 the viceroy received the visit of Toniatuh, a chief of the Cora Indians of the Nayarit mountains, upon whom he prevailed to receive a Spanish force in his mountains, which had been the refuge of criminals from New Galicia and New Vizcaya. When the chief afterward refused compliance with the treaty, Zuñiga sent a large force, which, after long warfare, conquered the tribe and established in their territory a town, which was called San Francisco de Valero. In 1719 war began with the French, and on 19 May they captured Pensacola, which was restored in 1720. On account of feeble health, the viceroy repeatedly resigned, and when, on 15 Oct., 1722, his successor arrived, he returned to Spain.

ZÚÑIGA, Dionisio de, Central American missionary, b. in Guatemala about 1550; d. in Chiapa about 1620. He entered the Dominican order in the province of Chiapa, and labored the greater part of his life in the missions among the Quiche Indians, in whose language he was so proficient that, besides translating Friar Francisco Viana's works, written in the dialect of Vera Paz, into Quiche, he also wrote a grammar, a volume of sermons, and several religious treatises in that language, the manuscripts of which are preserved in the episcopal archives of Guatemala. There also existed the manuscript of another work of his. "El Mare Magnum," a fantastical history of the Indian monarchies on the Pacific coast, but it is lost.

ZÚÑIGA Y ACEVEDO, Gaspar de, Count de Monterey, viceroy of Mexico and Peru, b. in Andalusia about 1540; d. in Lima, Peru, 10 Feb., 1606. Being appointed to succeed in Mexico Luis de Velasco the younger, who had been promoted to Peru, he sailed from Spain in 1595, and took charge of the government on 5 Nov. of that year. He was a protector of the native race, and nearly every Sunday went personally to the square to superintend the hiring of the Indians and prevent abuses by the employers and inferior authorities. In 1596 he despatched an expedition under Sebastian Vizcayno for the exploration and colonization of Lower California, which returned in the next year without accomplishing much for want of provisions. An English buccaneer, William Park, surprised and captured the city of Campeachy in 1597, obliging the alcalde to take refuge with a small force in the convent of San Francisco, but during the sacking of the town the governor returned from an expedition, and, joining the forces of the alcalde, totally defeated the English, forcing them to re-embark with heavy loss. In 1600 the city of Vera Cruz was removed from the former unhealthy locality to the present site opposite San Juan de Ulua, and in the same year an expedition under Juan de Oñate and Vicente Zaldivar was sent for the conquest of New Mexico. By order of the king, Zuñiga despatched, in 1602, a second expedition under Sebastian Vizcayno to explore the coast of Upper California and acquire information about the fabulous Strait of Anian. That expedition named the Bay of Monterey in honor of the viceroy, and the same name was given to a colony that was founded in New Leon. In 1603 Zuñiga was promoted viceroy of Peru, and, on the arrival of his successor, he delivered the government in October, to the great sorrow of the natives, who thronged, weeping, round their benefactor to take leave of him. The settling of his private affairs and detentions in Panama and Paita delayed him for more than a year, and he did not enter Lima till 28 Nov., 1604. With great activity he concluded the preparations for the fleet that was about to be sent by royal order for the exploration of the South sea under Pedro Fernandez Quiros. It sailed on 21 Dec., 1605, and shortly afterward he died, without being able to execute numerous measures that he had prepared for the benefit of the country.

ZÚÑIGA Y ONTIVEROS, Felipe, Mexican mathematician, b. in the city of Mexico about 1720; d. there in 1780. He was a printer by trade, and had an establishment in his native city, but had a passion for mathematical studies, became proficient in that science, and, after examination, was appointed royal land-surveyor and hydraulic and mining engineer. He was author of the following works, all printed in his establishment: "Efemérides calculadas y pronosticadas segun el Meridiano de México" (1752); "Explicación del Pronóstico de México" (1753); "Respuesta satisfactoria á las Anotaciones hechas á las Efemérides Mexicanas" (1756); and "Bomba hidráulica para levantar las aguas" (1770).

ZURILLA, Pedro de (thoo-reel'-yah), Spanish soldier, b. in Seville about 1500; d. near Asuncion, Paraguay, in 1544. He early entered military service, fought in Italy, and joined Pedro de Mendoza's expedition to the river Plate, assisting in the foundation of Buenos Ayres, 2 Feb., 1535, and serving as one of Juan de Ayolas's lieutenants in the expedition that explored Parana and Paraguay rivers. He participated in founding Asuncion, 15 Aug., 1535, and was a member of the common council of the new city. When Ayolas resumed the march forward, Zurilla commanded the rear-guard, and later was despatched to the ships that had been left in charge of Domingo de Irala, with the sick and to obtain supplies. But the soldiers refused to accompany him to rejoin his chief, and when news was received of Ayolas's death he was the first to propose the election of Irala as commander-in-chief. After the arrival of the new governor, Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca, in 1542, when difficulties arose between the latter and Irala, Zurilla advised a compromise, and induced Irala to accept Cabeza de Vaca's offers to make the former deputy governor. After assisting Irala in subduing the Guaycurus, he was detached in 1544 against the Cacove Indians, whom he defeated in several encounters, and built the fortress of San Juan in their territory. While he marched against the Xarayes, who had rebelled, the Cacoves stormed the fort of San Juan. and, joining forces with the Xarayes, attacked Zurilla. The latter retreated about eighty miles from Asuncion, where he resisted the Indians till the arrival of succor, dying a few days later from the wound of a poisoned arrow.

ZURITA, or ZORITA, Alonso (thoo-ree'-tah), Spanish statesman, b. in New Castile about 1500; d. in Seville about 1570. He studied law, was appointed in 1544 auditor of the audiencia of Santo Domingo, and was sent two years later to organize the administration of New Granada at Santa Marta and Cartagena. Returning to Santo Domingo in 1549, he was transferred a few months later to the audiencia of Los Confines or Comayagua, and, visiting nearly the whole country, organized courts of justice everywhere during a sojourn of three years. He was promoted member of the audiencia of Mexico in 1553, retired from active service about 1564, and then returned to Spain. He studied in America the early history and antiquities of the Indians, and addressed several interesting memorials to the king, one of which was printed in the 2d volume of Joaquin Garcia Icazbalceta's "Colección de documentos para la historia de México" (Mexico, 1858-'66). Another memorial, preserved in the archives of San Francisco in Mexico, was utilized by Lorenzo Boturini and Father Clavigero, and is also mentioned in Jose Mariano Beristain's catalogue, under the title of "Breve y sumaria Relación de los Caciques y Señores y sus maneras, y diferencia que había de ellos en la Nueva España, Leyes y Costumbres de los Indios y Tributos que pagaban á sus Principes." An abridged copy of it was published in Jose F. Ramirez's "Colección de Documentos inéditos relativos al Descubrimiento, Conquista, y Colonización de las Posesiones Españolas en América y Oceanía," but the original narrative was for the first time printed in its entirety in a French translation in Henry Ternaux-Compans's collection, under the title "Rapports sur les différentes classes de chefs dans la Nouvelle Espagne" (Paris, 1840). Zurita wrote also a treatise on taxation and, according to Boturini, a "Narrative of Facts concerning New Spain," which is lost.

ZURITA, Fernando, Spanish-American missionary, b. in Huete, Spain, in the 16th century. He was graduated in theology at the University of Alcalá, and, after his ordination, came as a missionary to this country, where he soon acquired the Indian language. He was the author of a book concerning the religion of the aborigines, "Theologiarum in Indis Questionum Enchiridion: ad Illustrissimum Dominum Gemozium Zapata, Episcopum Conchensem" (Madrid, 1586).

ZURITA, Pedro, Mexican Jesuit, b. in Puebla about 1690; d. in Oaxaca in 1739. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1712, and was very proficient in philosophy, which chair he held in the principal college of Mexico till 1727, when he was elected rector of the college in Oaxaca. He published "Elegia et Epigrammata in laudem Academiæ Mexicanæ in funere Illmi. Dom. Nicolai Gómez de Cervantes" (Mexico, 1736); and the following are still in manuscript in the library of the University of Mexico: "Naturalis Philosophiæ Explanatio"; "Funiculus Theologiæ Scholasticæ"; and "De Summa Trinitate et de Fide Divina."

SUPPLEMENT.

ABBETT

ABBETT, Leon, governor of New Jersey, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Oct., 1836. He was educated in his native city, studied law, and settled in Philadelphia, but subsequently removed to New York city, entered into partnership with William J. A. Fuller, and took high rank at the bar. He settled in Hoboken, N. J., in 1862, and served in the New Jersey legislature in 1865-'6 and 1869-'70, being twice speaker. He was chairman of the Democratic state convention in 1868, president of the state board of education in 1869, a member of the state senate in 1875-'7, and governor of New Jersey in 1884-'6. He was chairman of the state delegation to the National Democratic conventions in 1872, 1876, and 1880, and in 1888-'9 he was a candidate for the U. S. senate.

ABBOTT, Josiah Gardner, lawyer, b. in Chelmsford, Mass., 1 Nov., 1815. He was prepared for college by Ralph Waldo Emerson, was graduated at Harvard in 1832, and admitted to the bar in 1835. Mr. Abbott served in the legislature in 1836-'7, became state senator in 1841, and from 1864 until 1883 was a delegate-at-large to every National Democratic convention. He was a judge of the superior court of Suffolk county, Mass., in 1855-'8 removed to Boston, where he resumed his profession, and in 1874 was a Democratic candidate for congress. After successfully contesting the election of his opponent, he served from 28 July, 1876, till 3 March, 1877, but declined renomination, and resumed practice. In 1876 he was a member of the electoral commission. Williams gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1863.

ACTON, Thomas Coxon, banker, b. in New York city, 23 Feb., 1823. He was educated in his native city, was assistant deputy county clerk for three years, and then clerk in the surrogate's office, afterward deputy register for six years, in 1860 became commissioner of the New York metropolitan police, and two years later was president of that board, where he remained for seven years, in which office he did good service in suppressing the draft riots. In 1870 he was appointed superintendent of the U. S. assay-office, which post he held for twelve years. He became U. S. assistant treasurer at New York in 1882, and since 1887 he has been president of the bank of New Amsterdam in that city.

AGNEW, David Hayes, surgeon, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., 24 Nov., 1818. His education was received at Jefferson college, Pa., and at New-ark college, Del. He was graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1838, and began to practise in Chester county, but removed to Philadelphia and became a lecturer in the School of anatomy, also establishing the Philadelphia school of operative surgery. In 1854 he was elected one of the surgeons of the Philadelphia hospital, where he founded a pathological museum, and was also surgeon to the Pennsylvania hospital. In 1863 he was appointed demonstrator of anatomy and assistant lecturer on clinical surgery in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, in 1870 he was chosen to the chair of clinical surgery, and in 1871 he became professor of the principles and practice of surgery there, and of clinical surgery, in the University hospital. For several years he was one of the surgeons at Wills ophthalmic hospital, and also one of the surgeons to the orthopedic surgery. He has attained wide reputation as a surgeon, and is a rapid and skilful operator in every department. In his capacity of efficient surgeon, as well as of consulting physician, he has had many cases of great public and scientific importance, the best known being that of President Garfield. He has made many valuable contributions to the literature of his profession, among which are works on "Practical Anatomy" (Philadelphia, 1867) and "Lacerations of the Female Perineum and Vesico-vaginal Fistula" (1867); a series of sixty papers on "Anatomy and its Relation to Medicine and Surgery"; and an exhaustive work on the "Principles and Practice of Surgery" (3 vols., 1878), which has been translated into the Japanese language, and is the great work of his life.

AGNUS, Felix, soldier, b. in Lyons, France, 4 July, 1839. He was educated at College Jolie Clair, near Paris, and in 1852 set out on a voyage around the world, spending four years in that manner. In 1860 he came to the United States, and at the beginning of the civil war enlisted in Duryea's 5th New York zouaves. At the battle of Big Bethel he saved the life of Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, and was promoted to 2d lieutenant. He aided in raising the 165th New York volunteers, in which he was given the color company. In the autumn of 1862 his regiment was sent to Louisiana, and he took part in the siege of Port Hudson, where he was promoted major and for a time had command of his regiment. Subsequently he served in Texas, and, after attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel, was ordered to the 19th corps, and served under Gen. Philip H. Sheridan, taking part in the battles of Opequan, Fisher's Hill, Winchester, and Cedar Creek. His last service was in the Department of the South, where he was commissioned to dismantle the old Confederate forts in South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, and turn all the property over to the U. S. government. He received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1865, and was mustered out of service on 22 Aug., 1865. On resuming civil life he was given charge of the business department of the Baltimore "American," and he has since become its publisher.

ALDRICH, Charles, journalist, b. in Ellington, Chautauqua co., N. Y., 2 Oct., 1828. He received a common-school education, and spent one year in Jamestown academy. In 1857 he went to Iowa and established the "Freeman" in Webster City. He served as chief clerk of the Iowa house of representatives in 1860-'2, 1866, and 1870, and was a member of that body in 1882-'3. Mr. Aldrich is the author of many of the important laws of Iowa, including that changing the system of county government from dictatorship of a single county judge to a board of supervisors, for the protection of birds, and for the preservation of the public documents of the state. He originated the agitation in the public press that resulted in the repeal in Iowa of the so-called granger laws for the regulation of the transportation on the railways and the adoption of a commission system. In 1882 he became widely known through his efforts to secure legislation prohibiting the issue of railroad passes to public officers. His speeches and articles in the "North American Review" and elsewhere were circulated extensively in the United States and Europe. This agitation was largely instrumental in promoting the passage of the interstate commerce act. He presented to the state of Iowa, in 1884, his large and valuable collection of manuscripts, portraits, and autograph letters. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Iowa college in 1869. He was one of the founders of the American ornithologist's union in New York in 1883, and was elected corresponding member of the Wisconsin historical society in 1887.

ALEXANDER, Robert, member of the Continental congress, b. in Baltimore, Md., about 1740; d. probably in England after 1796. He was elected a member of the people's committee, 12 Nov., 1774, and of the Provincial convention of Maryland in 1775, and chosen a deputy to the Continental congress, 9 Dec., 1775, being re-elected, 4 July, 1776, but soon after the promulgation of the Declaration of Independence he sailed for England with other Baltimore loyalists. He was afterward appointed agent for Maryland loyalists to present and prosecute their claims before the British government.

ANDERSON, David, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. in London, England, 10 Feb., 1814; d. in Bristol, England, 5 Nov., 1885. He was graduated at Oxford in 1836, was vice-principal of St. Bee's college, Cumberland, in 1841-'7, and incumbent of All Saints', Derby, in 1848-'9. From 1849 till 1864 he was bishop of Prince Rupert's Land, Canada, and upon his resignation he returned to England and was appointed vicar of Clifton, and made chancellor of St. Paul's cathedral, London. Bishop Anderson received the degree of D. D. in 1849. He was the author of "Notes on the Flood"; "Net in the Bay"; and other works.

APPLETON, John, jurist, b. in New Ipswich, N. H., 12 July, 1804. He is the nephew of Jesse Appleton (vol. i., p. 84). After his graduation at Bowdoin in 1822, he taught, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and in 1832 settled in Bangor, Me. He was reporter of decisions in 1841, in 1852 was appointed a justice of the state supreme court, and in 1862-'83 was chief justice. Bowdoin gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1860. Judge Appleton published two volumes of "Reports" (Hallowell, 1841) and "The Rules of Evidence, Stated and Discussed" (Philadelphia, 1860).—His son, John Francis, soldier, b. in Bangor, Me., 29 Aug., 1839; d. there, 31 Aug., 1871, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1860, and at the beginning of the civil war raised and commanded a company in the 12th Maine volunteers. He was commissioned colonel of the 81st U. S. colored troops, served in the Department of the Gulf, and was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1865. Subsequently he studied law, was admitted to the bar of Maine, and appointed U. S. judge for the district of eastern Texas, but declined.

ARMSTRONG, Samuel Chapman, soldier, b. in Wailuka, Maui, Hawaiian islands, 30 Jan., 1839. His parents were among the first missionaries to the Sandwich islands, where he resided until 1860. After graduation at Williams in 1862 he entered the volunteer army as a captain in the 125th New York regiment, and in 1863 was made lieutenant-colonel of the 9th U. S. colored infantry. Subsequently he was colonel of the 8th U. S. colored regiment. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1865, and after the war went to Hampton, Va., to work among the freedmen. Gen. Armstrong was a founder of the Hampton normal and agricultural institute for negroes in 1868, and since that date has served as its principal. In 1878, Indians were admitted.

ASHHURST, John, surgeon, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 Aug., 1839. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1857, and at the medical department in 1860, and from 1862 till 1865 he served as acting assistant surgeon in the U. S. army. Since 1877 he has been professor of clinical surgery in the University of Pennsylvania, and he has been connected with several hospitals. He is the author of "Injuries of the Spine" (Philadelphia, 1867) and "Principles and Practice of Surgery" (1871), and the editor of "Transactions of the International Medical Congress" (1877) and the "International Encyclopædia of Surgery" (6 vols., New York, 1881-'6; 2d ed., 1888).

ATWOOD, Isaac Morgan, clergyman, b. in Pembroke, Genesee co., N. Y., 24 March, 1838. He was educated at Lockport, N. Y., entered the Universalist ministry in 1859, and was pastor of churches in New York, Maine, and Massachusetts. Since 1879 he has been president of Canton theological seminary, St. Lawrence university, where he is also professor of theology and ethics. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by St. Lawrence university in 1872, and that of D. D. by Tufts in 1879. He was editor of the "Boston Universalist" in 1867-'72, and of the "Christian Leader" in 1873-'5, and has been associate editor of the latter journal since 1875. Dr. Atwood is the author of "Have We Outgrown Christianity?" (Boston, 1870); "Glance at the Religious Progress of the United States" (1874); "Latest Word of Universalism" (1878); "Walks about Zion" (1881); and "Manual of Revelation" (1888).

BAIRD, Henry Samuel, lawyer, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 16 May, 1800; d. in Green Bay, Wis., 28 April, 1875. His father, Thomas Baird, one of the United Irishmen, was imprisoned for a year in Kilmainham jail, Dublin, and on his release in 1802 came to the United States, whence in 1805 he was followed by his family. Henry studied law at Pittsburg, Pa., and Cleveland, Ohio, and in 1822 settled in Mackinaw, Mich., where he opened a school. In the spring of 1823 a new court was established by act of congress, and he was admitted to practice. In September, 1824, he removed to Green Bay. In 1832 he served as quartermaster-general in the Black Hawk war, in 1836 was elected a member and chosen president of the first legislative council of the territory of Wisconsin, and the same year was appointed the first attorney-general of the territory, and subsequently in that year was secretary of Gov. Henry Dodge, U. S. commissioner to negotiate the treaty with the Menominee Indians at Cedar Rapids, when about 4,000,000 acres were ceded to the U. S. government. In 1846 he was a member of the Constitutional convention, and was chairman of the committee on the organization and officers of counties and towns, and their powers and duties. He was the last Whig candidate for governor of Wisconsin. For many years he was a vice-president of the State historical society, and a contributor to its published collections. In 1861-'2 he was mayor of Green Bay.—His brother, Thomas James, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 30 April, 1794; d. in Pottsville, Pa., 5 April, 1842; was graduated at West Point in 1814, served in the war against Great Britain, and resigned a captain of artillery in 1828.—The son of the latter, Edward Carey, b. in Pottsville, Pa., in April, 1836; d. near Ashland, Va., 14 Nov., 1874, served in the civil war for nearly four years, was assistant adjutant-general to Gen. John F. Reynolds, in command of the left wing of the Army of the Potomac; and on the first day of the battle of Gettysburg, that general died in his arms. Baird was promoted to the rank of major for gallant conduct.

BAKER, Peter Carpenter, publisher, b. in North Hempstead, N. Y., 25 March, 1822. Four of his ancestors were in the Revolutionary army. He was educated at Harlem academy, entered a book-store in New York, learned the printer's trade, and in 1850, with Daniel Godwin, established the firm of Baker and Godwin, which made a specialty of printing law-books and became widely known for fine work. In 1865 Mr. Baker established the law-publishing firm of Baker, Voorhis and Co., which is still in existence and has a large catalogue. Mr. Baker was one of the founders of the Metropolitan literary association, edited the "Steam Press," a patriotic periodical, during the civil war (1861-'5), and originated the plan for a statue of Benjamin Franklin in Printing-house square, New York, which was given by Albert De Groot. He early became known as a public speaker, delivering orations at Fort Independence, N. Y., 4 July, 1848; at Trenton, N. J., 4 July, 1849; and in the old Broadway tabernacle, New York, on the anniversary of Bunker Hill, 1853. He has published addresses and monographs, including, besides the orations noted above, "European Recollections" (New York, 1861) and "Franklin" (1865).

BAKER, Wendell, runner, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1862. He is a son of Francis Baker, a New York merchant, with whom he is now associated in business. He was graduated at Harvard in 1886. During his preparation for college and subsequently until his graduation he distinguished himself by winning twenty-one championships at university and intercollegiate meetings. He placed to his credit twelve best college records, and in his senior year made the world's records on the 100, 220, and 440 yards dash. Of these the first two he shares with numerous other amateurs, but on the 440 yards his time of 47 $\frac{1}{2}$ seconds is the best record by either amateur or professional runners.

BAKER, William Spohn, antiquarian, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 April, 1824. He became a conveyancer, but retired on account of his health, and turned his attention to art and literary pursuits. Mr. Baker possesses a collection of engraved portraits of George Washington which is the most complete that is known, and his number of medals of Washington is second only to that of William S. Appleton, of Boston, while his collection of biographies of Washington is the most noted in existence. He is a member of the American philosophical society, one of the council of the Pennsylvania historical society, and since 1885 has been vice-president of the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts. He is the author of "Origin and Antiquity of Engraving" (Philadelphia, 1872; 2d ed., illustrated, Boston, 1875); "American Engravers and their Works" (Philadelphia, 1875); "William Sharp, Engraver, and his Works" (1875); "Engraved Portraits of Washington" (1880); "Medallion Portraits of Washington" (1884); and "Character Portraits of Washington" (1887); and he is preparing for the press (1889) "A List of Biographies and Biographical Sketches of George Washington."

BALDWIN, Maurice Scollard, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. in Toronto, Canada, 21 June, 1836. He was graduated at Trinity college, Toronto, in 1859, ordained deacon in April, 1860, and became a presbyter in July, 1861. He was incumbent of Port Dover, Ont., in 1862-'5, and in 1870 was appointed curate of Christ church cathedral, Montreal. He became canon of the cathedral in the following year, and in 1872 was elected rector of the parish. In 1882 he was appointed dean of Montreal, and on 17 Oct., 1883, was elected bishop of Huron, to which office he was consecrated on 30 Nov. of the same year. He received the degree of D. D. from Trinity college, Toronto, in 1882. Bishop Baldwin is the author of "A Break in the Ocean Cable" (Montreal, 1877), "Life in a Look" (1879), and a volume of "Sermons."

BARBOUR, John Strode, senator, b. in Culpeper county, Va., 29 Dec., 1820. He was educated at the University of Virginia, adopted the profession of law, served several terms in the legislature, and was active in state politics. He was elected to congress as a Democrat in 1880, and served three terms. In 1883 he became chairman of the Democratic organization in Virginia, succeeded in preventing the re-election of Gen. William Mahone, and secured the defeat of the Readjuster party. He continued chairman of the Virginia Democratic committee in 1884-'8, and was active in the canvass for the election of Grover Cleveland to the presidency. In 1888 he was chosen U. S. senator as a Democrat. He has been active in railroad matters, and is president of the Virginia midland railroad company.

BARNES, Alfred Smith, publisher, b. in New Haven, Conn., 28 Jan., 1817; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 17 Feb., 1888. He entered the book-publishing business at sixteen years of age in Hartford, Conn., went to New York in 1835, and in 1838 formed a partnership with Prof. Charles Davies for the publication of the latter's mathematical works. He removed to Philadelphia in 1840, but returned to New York in 1845, and continued in the active management of his business till 1880. Soon after settling in New York he formed the plan of publishing the "National Series of Standard School-Books," and the firm's principal business has been in educational works. Mr. Barnes was interested in the establishment of the elevated railroads of New York city, and was connected with the central branch of the Union Pacific railroad, and several banking and insurance institutions. He gave liberally, and left $25,000 to be equally divided between twenty-five educational institutions, $25,000 to be equally divided between five religious societies, and $45,000 to the Young men's Christian association of Cornell.

BAXTER, James Phinney, author, b. in Gorham, Me., 23 March, 1831. He was educated in Portland, Me., and Lynn, Mass., and became a merchant and manufacturer. He organized the associated charities in Portland, and was instrumental in founding the Maine industrial school for girls. Mr. Baxter in 1887 presented to the Portland public library, the Portland society of art, and the Maine historical society conjointly, a lot of land, and is erecting upon it, at a cost of $100,000, a building for these societies. He is the author of a volume of poems entitled "Idyls of the Year" (Portland, 1884); "The Trelawney Papers," published as the 3d volume of the "Documentary History of Maine" (1884); "George Cleeve, of Casco Bay, 1630-1667" (1885); and "Sir Ferdinando Gorges and his Province of Maine" (1889). He has also edited "Digby's Journal," the writer of which served under Burgoyne, under the title of "The British Invasion from the North" (Albany, 1887), and the 4th volume of the "Documentary History of Maine," containing documents from American and foreign archives (Portland, 1889).

BELLAMY, Edward, author, b. in Chicopee Falls, Mass., 26 March, 1850. He was educated at Union college but was not graduated. In 1871, after studying law, he was admitted to practice. For several years he was assistant editor of the Springfield, Mass., "Union," an editorial writer of the New York "Evening Post," and a founder of the Springfield "Daily News." He is now a contributor to various magazines. His published works are "Six to One, a Nantucket Idyl" (New York, 1877); "Dr. Heidenhoff's Process" (1879); "Miss Ludington's Sister" (Boston, 1885); and "Looking Backward" (1888).

BENHAM, Andrew Ellicott Kennedy, naval officer, b. on Staten island, 10 April, 1832. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 24 Nov., 1847, and became a passed midshipman, 10 June, 1853. He was ordered to the "Princeton" in July, 1853, transferred to the "St. Mary's," Pacific squadron, and served on her till 1857, and was commissioned a master, 15 Sept., and lieutenant, 16 Sept., 1855. He was attached to the "Crusader," on the Home station, in 1860-'1, and when the civil war began he was made executive officer of the "Bienville," on the South Atlantic blockade, where he participated in the capture of Port Royal, S. C., and in 1863 served in the "Sacramento." Benham was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and given the "Penobscot," in the Western Gulf blockading squadron, until the close of the war in 1865. He was on duty at the Brooklyn navy-yard in 1866, and on special service in the "Susquehanna" in 1867. He was promoted to commander, 25 July, 1866, served at the Brooklyn navy-yard in 1868-'9, as light-house inspector in 1870-'1, and commanded the monitors "Saugus" in 1871-'2 and "Canonicus" in 1872-'3, on the North Atlantic station. He then served as light-house inspector in 1874-'8, was promoted to captain, 12 March, 1875, and commanded the flag-ship "Richmond," on the Asiatic station, in 1878-'81. He was on duty at Portsmouth navy-yard from 8 Dec., 1881, until 15 Nov., 1884, when he was appointed lighthouse inspector, and served until January, 1888. He was promoted to the rank of commodore, 30 Oct., 1885.

BIDDLE, James Stokes, naval officer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Jan., 1818. He was appointed a midshipman in the U. S. navy, 18 Oct., 1833, and became lieutenant, 20 Aug., 1844. He was engaged in the Florida war with a fleet of boats, and during the Mexican war he was in command of a gun-boat and served with the naval batteries in the siege of Vera Cruz and the capture of Tobasco. In 1856 he resigned from the navy and was elected president of the Shamokin Valley railroad. In 1861, at the opening of the civil war, he offered his services to the secretary of the navy, agreeing to retire at the close of the war, but no formal action was taken in regard to it. In 1871 he was the Democratic candidate for mayor of Philadelphia, but was not elected.—His kinsman, Craig, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, 10 Jan., 1823, is a son of Nicholas Biddle (1786-1844), was graduated at Princeton in 1841, and was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1844. He represented Philadelphia in the legislature in 1849-'50. In April, 1861, he was made a major on the staff of Gen. Robert Patterson, and served in the Shenandoah valley. He was then appointed on the staff of Gov. Andrew G. Curtin, and was detailed to organize new regiments. On the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania by the Confederate army in 1863, he joined a regiment of Philadelphia militia as a private, and marched to the front. In January, 1875, he was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia, and in the following autumn was elected to the same office, as a Republican, by a large majority. In 1885 he was re-elected, having been renominated as well by the Democratic party as by his own. He has been president of the Philadelphia agricultural society, and has written on agriculture and on a variety of other subjects. He is a member of the Historical society of Pennsylvania, and has been one of its vice-presidents.—Another kinsman, Chapman, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Jan., 1822; d. there, 9 Dec., 1880, was the son of Clement C. Biddle (1784-1855), who organized and was first captain of the State fencibles, and had command of the 1st volunteer light infantry in the war of 1812. The son was educated at St. Mary's college in Baltimore, and was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1848. He soon attained a lucrative practice, and was solicitor of the Pennsylvania railroad company, and subsequently counsel for that corporation. In April, 1861, he formed a company of artillery to aid in protecting Philadelphia, and was made its captain. During the summer of 1862 he undertook the raising of a regiment of infantry, which on 1 Sept., 1862, as the 121st Pennsylvania volunteers, took the field with him as its colonel. He took part in the battles of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, and at Gettysburg had command of a brigade in the 1st corps. In December, 1863, he resigned from the army and resumed the practice of his profession, which he continued until shortly before his death. Col. Biddle was connected with the Fairmount park art association, and, through his counsel, beautiful fountains and groups were placed in the park.

BINGHAM, Henry Harrison, congressman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 July, 1841. He was graduated at Jefferson college in 1862, became a lieutenant in the 140th Pennsylvania volunteers, was wounded at Gettysburg, Spottsylvania, and Farmville, and in July, 1866, was mustered out as judge advocate, with the rank of major and brevet brigadier-general of volunteers. He was postmaster at Philadelphia in 1867-'72, but resigned to become clerk of the courts ofoyer and terminer and quarter sessions of Philadelphia, to which office he was re-elected in 1875, and served till 1878, when he was chosen to congress as a Republican. He has since occupied a seat in the latter body by re-election. Gen. Bingham was a delegate-at-large from Pennsylvania to the National Republican convention in 1872, and a delegate from the first district to the conventions of 1876, 1884, and 1888.

BISHOP, Judson Wade, soldier, b. in Evansville, Jefferson co., N. Y., 24 June, 1831. He received his education at Fredonia academy, N. Y., where his father was settled as pastor of the Baptist church for several years, and later at Belleville, Jefferson co. After serving as a clerk and book-keeper, he taught for two winters, then studied civil engineering, and in 1853 entered the office of the Grand Trunk railway at Kingston, Ont. After serving as an assistant engineer there and in Minnesota, he settled in Chatfield, Minn., as a surveyor, publishing a map and pamphlet history of that county. He also taught there, and then purchasing the "Democrat" in 1859, which he published until 1861, when he sold it and recruited a company of volunteers. He was mustered as a captain of the 2d Minnesota regiment on 26 June, 1861, and served through the war in the west. He rose to be colonel, 14 July, 1864, and was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers on 7 June, 1865. Since the war he has been engaged in building and operating railroads in Minnesota. He resigned in April, 1881, to engage in railroad construction.

BLODGETT, Henry Williams, jurist, b. in Amherst, Mass., 21 July, 1821. His parents removed to Illinois about 1831. When seventeen years of age Henry attended the Amherst academy one year, whence he returned to Illinois and engaged in teaching and subsequently in land-surveying until twenty-one years of age. He studied law in Chicago with Jonathan Y. Scammon and Norman B. Judd, was admitted to the bar in 1845, and began practice in Waukegan, Ill., where he still resides. In 1844 he voted the Anti-slavery ticket, and he has since been an adherent of the Anti-slavery and Republican parties. In 1852 he was elected to the general assembly of Illinois, being the first avowed Anti-slavery member that ever occupied a seat in that body, and in the following year was elected to the state senate. As a legislator he was one of the ablest and most useful, and was largely instrumental in shaping the legislation of the commonwealth and in promoting the development of the resources of Illinois. In 1855 and for several years subsequently he was associated with the legal department of the Chicago and Northwestern railway, of which he was one of the projectors. He was the pioneer in the building of the Chicago and Milwaukee railroad, and was identified with it in the capacities of attorney, director, and president. Later he was solicitor of the Michigan Southern, Fort Wayne, Rock Island, and Northwestern roads, and he retired when the business reached such proportions that it was impossible for one man to attend to it. In 1870 he was appointed by President Grant a judge of the U. S. district court for the northern district of Illinois, which office he still holds.

BLODGETT, Rufus, senator, b. in Dorchester, N. H., 9 Oct., 1834. He studied in local schools and academies, and at the age of eighteen was apprenticed to the Amoskeag locomotive works, at Manchester, N. H., where he learned the trade of a machinist. In 1866 he removed to New Jersey and engaged in the railroad business. From 1874 till 1884 he was superintendent of the New Jersey southern railroad, and in the latter year was appointed superintendent of the New York and Long Branch railroad, which place he still holds. Senator Blodgett is also president of the Long Branch city bank. He was a member of the New Jersey legislature in 1878-'80, and was a delegate to the Democratic national convention in 1880. In 1887 he was elected as a Democrat to the U. S. senate, and took his seat on 4 March of that year.

BONNEY, Charles Carroll, reformer, b. in Hamilton, N. Y., 4 Sept., 1831. He was educated at Hamilton academy, settled in Peoria, Ill., in 1850, and in 1852 was admitted to the bar. He removed to Chicago in 1860, where he soon attained a large practice. Mr. Bonney was elected president of the National law and order league in New York in 1885, and has since been annually re-elected to that office. He has been president of the Illinois state bar association, and a member of the American bar association. Among the reform measures proposed by him are constitutional prohibition of special legislation; a national currency under a national law; national uniformity of commercial paper; an extension of equity practice to bankruptcy and other law proceedings; civil-service pensions; and state boards of labor and capital. Besides numerous pamphlets, addresses, and essays on public questions, he has published "Rules of Law for the Carriage and Delivery of Persons and Property by Railway" (Chicago, 1864) and "A Summary of the Law of Marine, Fire, and Life Insurance" (1865), and edited "Poems by Alfred W. Arrington, with a Sketch of his Character" (1869).

BRIGHTLY, Frederick Charles, lawyer, b. in Bungay, Suffolk, England, 26 Aug., 1812; d. in Germantown, Pa., 24 Jan., 1888. After serving as a midshipman under the East Indian company he came to this country in 1831, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1839. Mr. Brightly retired from active practice about 1870, and devoted his time to legal authorship. His collection of about 5,000 volumes is one of the best private law libraries in this country. He printed a descriptive catalogue of his books, with critical notices of authors and subjects, for private circulation (Philadelphia, 1885). His legal works are "The Law of Costs in Pennsylvania" (1847); "Reports of Cases decided by the Judges of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania," with notes (1851); "The Equitable Jurisdiction of the Courts of Pennsylvania" (1855); "An Analytical Digest of the Laws of the United States, 1789-1869" (2 vols., 1865-'9); "A Digest of the Decisions of the Federal Courts" (2 vols., 1868-'73); "The Bankrupt Law of the United States" (1871); "A Collection of Leading Cases on the Law of Elections in the United States" (1871); "Constitution of Pennsylvania, as Amended in the Year 1874," to which is appended the constitution of 1838 (1874); "A Digest of the Decisions of the Courts of the State of New York to January, 1884" (3 vols., New York, 1875-'84); and "A Digest of the Decisions of the Courts of the State of Pennsylvania from 1754 to 1882" (3 vols., Philadelphia, 1877-'83). "A Digest of the Laws of Pennsylvania from 1700 to 1883" (1883). He also republished two editions of "Binn's Justice, or Magistrate's Daily Companion" (1870-'86); also "The Practice in Civil Actions and Proceedings in the Courts of Pennsylvania" (2 vols., 1880), popularly known as "Troubat and Haley's Practice," and has edited numerous volumes of reports and other legal works.—His son, Francis Frederick, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 26 Feb., 1845, was graduated at the law department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1866. He has published "A Digest of the Laws and Ordinances of the City of Philadelphia" (2 vols., 1887), and "A Digest of the Laws of Pennsylvania from 1883 to 1887" (1887).

BROOKS, William Robert, astronomer, b. in Maidstone, England, 11 June, 1844. He came to this country in 1857, and settled with his parents in Darien, N. Y. When he was only fourteen years of age he constructed a telescope; and at the age of eighteen delivered his first astronomical lectures. Subsequently he was employed as a mechanical draughtsman, and invented various improvements in astronomical, photographic, and other scientific instruments. In 1870 he settled in Phelps, N. Y., where, in 1874, he founded and became the director of the Red House observatory. In 1888 he removed to Geneva, N. Y., to take charge of Smith observatory. His work has consisted largely in the discovery of comets, and thirteen of these bodies have been credited to him since 1881, of which two were the first observed return of the notable long-period comets of 1812 and of 1815. He found two in 1885 and the first three that were discovered in 1886, making a record of five comets within a period of nine months, of which four were in succession and two within four days. Three of these, bearing his name, were visible at the same time, which is unparalleled in the history of astronomy. Mr. Brooks is a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and a fellow of the Royal astronomical society of Great Britain, and has won a number of prizes by his discoveries. He has lectured frequently, and, besides papers on his specialty, has published poems, of which "Milton" and "The Pilgrim of Lavergne" have been widely copied.

BROWNE, John Mills, surgeon, b. in Hinsdale, N. H., 10 May, 1831. He was graduated at the medical department of Harvard in March, 1852, and entered the U. S. navy as an assistant surgeon, 26 March, 1853. In 1855-'6 he participated in the Indian war on Puget sound, and subsequently he took part in the survey of the north-west boundary. He became a passed assistant surgeon, 12 May, 1858, served in the brig "Dolphin," suppressing the slave-trade on the west coast of Africa in 1858, and in October of that year joined the Paraguay expedition. He was commissioned a surgeon, 19 June, 1861, and attached to the steamer "Kearsarge" until 9 Dec., 1864, participating in the engagement with the Confederate cruiser "Alabama." He served at the Mare island navy-yard from 1869 till 1871, during which time he superintended the erection of the naval hospital there. He was commissioned as medical inspector, 1 Dec., 1871, and was fleet-surgeon of the Pacific fleet in 1872-'6. He served at the naval hospital at Mare island, Cal., in 1876-'80, was commissioned a medical director, 6 Oct., 1878, and was a member of the examining board at Washington, from 2 July, 1880, to 26 Oct., 1882, when he took charge of the Museum of hygiene until 1 July, 1886, after which he was again appointed a member of the examining and retiring board. On 27 March, 1888, he was appointed chief of the bureau of medicine and surgery and surgeon-general of the navy.

BUCHANAN, Joseph, inventor, b. in Washington county, Va., 24 Aug., 1785; d. in Louisville, Ky., 29 Sept., 1829. He removed to Tennessee in 1795, was educated at Transylvania university, Kentucky, studied medicine, and practised in Port Gibson, Miss., but in 1808 removed to Lexington, Ky., where in 1811 he was appointed professor of the institutes of medicine in the medical department of Transylvania university. Among his numerous inventions was a new musical instrument, in which the notes were produced by glasses of different chemical composition, and a steam-engine with which, in 1824, he ran a wagon through the streets of Louisville. He claimed to have discovered a new motive power, derived from combustion without the aid of water and steam, which is now utilized in the air-engines of John Ericsson and others; and also originated what he called "the music of light," to be produced by means of "harmonific colors luminously displayed." Dr. Buchanan edited the "Palladium" in Frankfort, the "Western Spy" and the "Literary Cadet" in Cincinnati, and the "Focus" in Louisville, and was the author of the "Philosophy of Human Nature" (Richmond, Ky., 1812). He was the father of Joseph Rodes Buchanan (vol. i., p. 436).

BUNGAY, George Washington, journalist, b. in Walsham-le-Willows, Suffolk, England, 28 Nov., 1826. He came to this country at an early age, was educated in New York city, and engaged in journalism. From 1873 till 1887 he was employed in the New York custom-house. He is a well-known lecturer, has contributed to the press, was literary editor of the "Metropolitan," a weekly journal in New York, and is the author of "Off-Hand Takings, or Crayon Sketches" (New York, 1854); "Traits of Representative Men" (1882); "Pen Portraits of Illustrious Abstinents," published by the National temperance society (1884); and "The Creeds of the Bells," a poem.

BURKE, Maurice Francis, R. C. bishop, b. in Ireland, 15 May, 1845. He came to this country with his parents in 1849, was educated at St. Mary's university, Chicago, Ill., and in the American college at Rome, Italy, and in 1875 was ordained a priest in the Roman Catholic church. He was assistant at St. Mary's church, Chicago, for the three subsequent years, and afterward pastor of St. Mary's church, Joliet, Ill., till 1887, when he became bishop of Cheyenne, Wyoming territory.

BURLEIGH, George Shepard, poet, b. in Plainfield, Conn., 26 March, 1821. He was educated in the district schools, assisted his brother, William H. Burleigh (vol. i., p. 455), in editing the "Charter Oak," and subsequently devoted his time to intellectual pursuits. He has published "Anti-Slavery Hymns" (New London, Conn., 1842); "The Maniac, and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1849); and "Signal Fires, or the Trail of the Pathfinder" (New York, 1856); and translated into English verse Victor Hugo's "La légende des siècles" (printed privately, 1867).

BURTON, Robert, member of the Continental congress, b. in Mecklenburg county, Va., in 1747; d. in Granville county, N. C., 10 April, 1825. He removed to Granville county, N. C., about 1775, was a commissioned officer in the Continental army, and in 1787 a member of the Continental congress. He was one of the commissioners to run the line between the states of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia in 1801.

BUTLER, George Bernand, artist, b. in New York city, 8 Feb., 1838. His father, of the same name, and his uncle Charles were both well-known lawyers. He began under Thomas Hicks to study painting, and in 1859 spent some time in Thomas Couture's studio in Paris. In the autumn of 1860 he returned to the United States and served in the National army during the civil war, losing an arm at the battle of Gettysburg. He returned to Europe in 1865 and devoted himself to painting animals, also studying with Otto Weber. For two years he continued his work under Couture at Senlis, and spent the winter of 1867-'8 in Italy. He then returned to this country, but in 1873 visited Europe again, and was during the ten following years in Italy, chiefly in Rome and Venice. At this time he met James A. M. Whistler, who exerted very great influence on his work. Since 1883 he has been engaged principally in portraiture. In 1873 he was elected a National academician. His paintings include "The Shepherd and Dogs on the Campagna"; "The Capri Rose," purchased by Alexander T. Stewart; "The Lace-Maker"; "An Italian Peasant"; and several striking groups of animals.

BYERS, Samuel Hawkins Marshall, poet, b. in Pulaski, Pa., 23 July, 1838. He was educated in the public schools of Oskaloosa, Iowa, and studied law, but did not practice. He served in the National army, was taken prisoner in November, 1863, and while in confinement in Columbia, S. C., wrote the song entitled "Sherman's March to the Sea," whose popularity gave its name to the campaign it celebrated. He was U. S. consul at Zurich, Switzerland, in 1869-'84, and consul-general to Italy in 1885. In addition to being a frequent contributor to magazines, Mr. Byers is the author of "The Happy Isles, and other Poems" (Boston, 1885); "History of Switzerland" (New York, 1886); and "Military History of Iowa" (Des Moines, Iowa, 1888).

CADWALADER, Thomas, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1708; d. near Trenton, N. J., 14 Nov., 1779. He began the study of medicine in Philadelphia and completed his course in London. About 1731 he returned to Philadelphia, and continued his profession there for fifteen years.

During the winter of 1736-'7 he is mentioned as one of the physicians that inoculated for the small-pox. In 1746 he removed to Trenton, N. J., but in 1750 he returned to Philadelphia. He subscribed in 1751 toward the capital stock of the Pennsylvania hospital, of which he became one of candidates that applied for the post of surgeon in the navy, and at the same time he was appointed a medical director of the army hospitals. In 1778 he succeeded the elder William Shippen as surgeon of Pennsylvania hospital, and previously, in 1765, he had been elected trustee of the Medical college of Philadelphia, where he gave a course of lectures. Dr. Cadwalader was a member of the American philosophical society and the American society for promoting useful knowledge before their union in 1769. He was one of the original corporators of the Philadelphia library company in 1731. It is reported that he saved the life of a son of Gov. Jonathan Belcher by the application of electricity before 1750, and he published an "Essay on the West India Dry Gripes" (1745). Its purpose was to prove that quicksilver and drastic purgatives were highly injurious to the system. He was the father of Gen. John Cadwalader and of Col. Lambert Cadwalader. — His grandson, Thomas, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 Oct., 1779; d. there, 31 Oct., 1841, was the son of Gen. John Cadwalader, and was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1795. After studying law he was admitted to the bar, but took charge of the interests of the Penn family, which withdrew him from practice. In April, 1799, he was a private soldier in a cavalry troop, and was one of the sixteen that captured the ringleaders of the insurrection in Pennsylvania. During the war of 1812 he was a lieutenant-colonel of cavalry, and he was afterward appointed to command the advanced light-brigade. Under Gen. Cadwalader's training these troops became remarkable for their efficiency and discipline. In 1812 he was appointed major-general of the 1st division of Pennsylvania militia. With Winfield Scott and Zachary Taylor he was appointed in 1826 to revise the tactics of the U. S. army. In 1816 he was appointed a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania. — His son, John, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 April, 1805; d. there, 26 Jan., 1879, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1821, and in 1825, after studying law with Horace Binney, was admitted to the bar. The place of solicitor of the Bank of the United States was given to him by his relative, Nicholas Biddle, then its president, and his services were also retained by the government in important cases, among which was the Blackburne cloth prosecution. Mr. Cadwalader afterward confined himself to private practice in his profession, and was one of the best-known commercial lawyers in the United States. In 1844, after the riots of that year, he raised a company for the city artillery composed chiefly of lawyers, which was partially supported by the city authorities. He was elected to congress as a Democrat and served from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1857. In 1858 he was appointed judge of the U. S. district court, and he served thereafter on the bench until his death. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by the University of Pennsylvania in 1870. — Dr. Thomas's grandson, Thomas, soldier, b. near Trenton, N. J., 11 Sept., 1795; d. there, 22 Oct., 1873, was the son of Col. Lambert Cadwalader (vol. i., p. 494). He was born at Greenwood, a property that was purchased by his father in 1776, and is still owned by the family. Young Cadwalader was graduated at Princeton in 1815 and then studied law, but never practised. He was appointed deputy adjutant-general of the New Jersey militia on 2 June, 1830, aide-de-camp to the governor, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and adjutant-general of the state, with the rank of brigadier-general, on 30 July, 1842. This office he

the original physicians, and in the same year was elected a member of the common council, in which he served until 1774. Dr. Cadwalader was called to the provincial council on 2 Nov., 1755, and signed the non-importation articles. In July, 1776, the committee of safety of Pennsylvania appointed him on a committee for the examination of all retained through several political changes, until his resignation on 26 Jan., 1858. In 1856, at the request of the governor, he travelled through various European countries and reported on the firearms there in use, which report was printed. He was brevetted major-general in March, 1858, in pursuance of a special act of the legislature for his long and meritorious services.—His son, John Lambert, lawyer, b. near Trenton, N. J., 17 Nov., 1836, was graduated at Princeton in 1856 and at Harvard law-school in 1860. His legal studies were made with Daniel Lord in New York city, and subsequently he practised his profession in that place. During 1874-'6 he was assistant secretary of state under Hamilton Fish.—Another son, Richard McCall, lawyer, b. in Trenton, N. J., 17 Sept., 1839, was graduated at Princeton in 1860, and at Harvard law-school in 1863. He was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1864, where he has since practised successfully. Mr. Cadwalader is the author of "The Law of Ground Rents" (Philadelphia, 1879).

CAMERON, Henry Clay, educator, b. in Shepherdstown, Va., 1 Sept., 1827. He was graduated at Princeton in 1847, and at the theological seminary in 1855. Meanwhile he was principal of the Edgehill school in Princeton in 1851, and in 1852-'5 tutor at the college. He was made adjunct professor of Greek in 1855, associate in 1860, and professor in 1861, and since 1877 he has held the chair of the Greek language and literature. In addition he was instructor in French in 1859-'70, and librarian in 1865-'72. Prof. Cameron was ordained a clergyman by the presbytery of Philadelphia on 1 Feb., 1863. The degree of Ph. D. was given him by Princeton in 1866, and he received that of D. D. from both Rutgers and Wooster in 1875. For more than twenty years he edited the "General Catalogue of the College of New Jersey," and, in addition to cyclopædia articles and essays, including one on "Jonathan Dickinson and the Rise of Colleges in America," he has published "Princeton Roll of Honor," a list of the graduates of that college that fought in the war for the Union (Princeton, 1865); "The History of the American Whig Society" (1871), and with Prof. Arnold Guyot a series of classical maps.

CASEY, Thomas Lincoln, soldier, b. in Madison Barracks, Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., 10 May, 1831. He is the son of Gen. Silas Casey (vol. i., p.

Thos. L. Casey

550), and was graduated at the U. S. military academy as brevet 2d lieutenant of engineers in 1852. In 1854-'9 he was assistant professor of engineering at the military academy. From 1859 till 1861 he had command of the engineer troops on the Pacific coast. During the civil war he served at first as staff engineer at Fort Monroe, Va., became captain in the engineer corps on 6 Aug., 1861, was superintending engineer of the permanent defences and field fortifications upon the coast of Maine, and served on special duty with the North Atlantic squadron during the first expedition to Fort Fisher, N. C., 8-29 Dec., 1864. He was made major on 2 Oct., 1863, and brevetted lieutenant-colonel and colonel on 13 March, 1865. In 1877 he was placed in charge of the public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, the Washington aqueduct, and the construction of the building for the state, war, and navy departments, which was completed on 31 May, 1888. He was engineer of the Washington monument from 1878 till its completion in 1884, and on 1 Nov., 1886, he became president of the board of engineers, in New York city. On 6 July, 1888, he was appointed brigadier-general, and chief of engineers, U. S. army, and on 2 Oct., 1888, he was, by act of congress, placed in charge of the erection of the building for the Library of congress. Besides numerous official reports, and articles upon engineering, he has contributed sketches to historical and genealogical magazines.

CATHCART, Charles Murray, governor of Canada, b. in England, 21 Dec., 1783; d. there, 16 July, 1859. He was educated at Eton, and at the age of fifteen entered the army as an ensign. He served on the continent under the Duke of Wellington, and at the battle of Waterloo, where he led several charges, three horses were killed under him. He succeeded his father as second Earl Cathcart, in 1843, was appointed commander-in-chief of the troops in British North America in 1845, and on the retirement of Lord Metcalfe in 1846, he assumed the civil government as well. A year later he resigned his military command, returned to England, and was then succeeded in his civil office by Lord Elgin. Subsequently he was appointed to the command of the Northern and Midland district of England, which post he retained until 1854. He also served on various commissions and was for several years a member of parliament.

CATHERWOOD, Mary Hartwell, author, b. in Luray, Ohio, 16 Dec., 1847. She was graduated at the Female college, Granville, Ohio, in 1868, and on 27 Dec., 1887, married James S. Catherwood, with whom she resides in Hoopston, Ill. Mrs. Catherwood is the author of "Craque-o'-doom" (Philadelphia, 1881); "Rocky Fork" (Boston, 1882); "Old Caravan Days" (1884); "The Secrets at Roseladies" (1888); "The Romance of Dollard" (1889) and "The Bells of Ste. Anne" (1889).

CHARNAV, Désiré, explorer, b. in Fleurie, France, 2 May, 1828. He was educated at the College Charlemagne, and has been sent by the French government on many scientific explorations, including one in 1880 to Central America, which was aided by the generosity of Pierre Lorillard. He is the author of "Cités et ruines américaines" (Paris, 1861); "Le Mexique" (1862); "Explorations au Mexique et Amérique du Centre" (1883); "Les anciennes villes du nouveau monde" (1883); and "Une princesse indienne avant la conquête" (1888). "The Ancient Cities of the New World" was translated by Mrs. J. Gonino and Mrs. Helen S. Conant, with an introductory chapter by Allen Thorndike Rice (New York, 1887).

CLARK, Emmons, secretary, b. in Huron, Wayne co., N. Y., 14 Oct., 1827. He received his early education at Owego and Groton, and was graduated at Hamilton college in 1847. Before arriving at his majority he studied medicine, but shortly thereafter, removing to New York city, he became a clerk in the first office established in Broadway for the transportation of through freight and passengers to Chicago and the west, and he rose rapidly to the place of manager. Retiring from mercantile pursuits, he was appointed secretary of the Board of health at its organization in 1866, and he has since held that office. In January, 1857, he enlisted as a private in the Second company of the 7th regiment ("National Guard"), N. Y. state militia; was elected 1st sergeant, April, 1858; 2d lieutenant, September, 1859; 1st lieutenant, June, 1860; and captain in December of the same year; and was in command of his company in the three campaigns made by the regiment, in 1861, 1862, and 1863, during the civil war, and in the draft riots of 1863. He commanded the 7th regiment in the Orange riot of 1871 and in the labor riots of 1877. In 1864 he published a "History of the Second Company of the Seventh Regiment, N. Y. State Militia." He was elected colonel of his regiment on 21 June, 1864, and still holds that command. To his energy and perseverance is due the successful completion by private subscription in 1880 of the armory (see illustration) now occupied by the 7th regiment, while his executive ability and untiring attention have not only maintained, but increased, the superiority, efficiency, and prosperity of that celebrated military organization. Col. Clark has in preparation a "History of the Seventh Regiment," to be published in 1889, during which year he has announced his intention of resigning on the completion of a quarter of a century's service as colonel of the regiment.

CLARKE, Rebecca Sophia, author, b. in Norridgewock, Me., 22 Feb., 1833. She was carefully educated, has engaged in literary pursuits since her youth, and is the author, under the pen-name of "Sophie May," of "Little Prudy Stories" (Boston, 1864-'5); "Dotty Dimple Stories" (1868-'70); "Flyaway Stories" (1871-'4); "The Doctor's Daughter" (1873); "Our Helen" (1875); "The Asbury Twins" (1876); "Flaxie Frizzle Stories" (1877-'85); "Quinnebasset Girls" (1878); "Janet" (1883); and "Drones' Honey" (1887).

CLARKSON, Matthew, philanthropist, b. in New York, 17 Oct., 1758; d. there, 25 April, 1825.

He was the great-grandson of Matthew Clarkson, who for thirteen years was secretary of the province, and his father and grandfather also held important places in the colony. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war, in 1775, the son became a private in a company of fusiliers under Rudolph Ritzema, and afterward he served in Col. Josiah Smith's regiment of minute-men, which was rendered effective service to Col. Daniel Morgan, also acted as aide-de-camp to Benedict Arnold, and was present at the surrender of Gen. John Burgoyne. In 1779 he was appointed aide to Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, under whom he participated in the siege of Savannah, and in the defence of Charleston he served as a major of infantry, and became a prisoner at the surrender. In 1781 he returned to his place as aide to Gen. Lincoln, and was with him at the reduction of Yorktown. He also served on the expedition of Com. Abraham Whipple during the siege of Charleston, and later in the "Jason." When Lincoln became secretary of war, Clarkson acted as his assistant, and on the conclusion of hostilities he received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel, and for more than fourteen years was major-general of the state militia. He served in both branches of the legislature, and was candidate of the Federal party for U. S. senator. For twenty-one years he was president of the Bank of New York, one of the first promoters of the free-school system, a regent of the University of the state of New York in 1784-1825, governor of the New York hospital for thirty years, during twenty-three of which he was president, and one of the vice-presidents and founders of the American Bible society, and his name is associated with the foundation of nearly all the early philanthropic societies of that city.

CLEVELAND, Cynthia Eloise, author, b. in Canton, N. Y., 13 Aug., 1845. She was educated in Michigan and Medina, N. Y., and engaged in business in that place and Pontiac, Mich. In 1880-'2, as president of the Women's Christian temperance union of Dakota, she organized unions with so great success as to influence the vote of the territory for constitutional prohibition. She then settled in Pierre, and was admitted to the bar in 1883. In 1884 she entered the presidential canvass in Michigan and Indiana, being the first woman that ever spoke in public for the Democratic party. She removed to Washington, D. C., in 1885, and was appointed a law-clerk in the treasury department. She has written "See-Saw, or Civil Service in the Departments" (Detroit, 1887), a political novel, and "Is it Fate?" (1888).

COFFEE, John, soldier, b. in Prince Edward county, Va., 2 June, 1772; d. near Florence, Ala., in July, 1834. He removed to Davidson county, Tenn., in 1798, and engaged in mercantile pursuits till 1807, when he began to survey public lands. In October, 1809, he married Mary Donelson, a sister of Andrew Jackson's wife. At the beginning of the war of 1812 he raised a cavalry regiment, and after the massacre at Fort Minns he organized two others, became brigadier-general of militia, and fought and won the battle of Tallushatchie. He participated also in the battles of Talladega, Emuckfaro, Ala., where he was severely wounded, Enotochopco, and the Horseshoe. He was subsequently at the battles of Pensacola and New Orleans, reaching the latter in time for the fight by a forced march from Baton Rouge in two days, and commanding Jackson's left wing. He was frequently commissioned to treat with the Indians, became surveyor-general of the Southwest territory in 1817, removed to Huntsville, Ala., and later to Florida. He was known as "brave Jack Coffee."

CONY, Daniel, jurist, b. in that part of Stoughton, Mass., that is now Sharon, 3 Aug., 1752; d. in Augusta, Me., 21 Jan., 1842. His grandfather, Nathanael, came from England to Massachusetts in the latter part of the 17th century and settled in Boston, but in 1728 went to Stoughton. Daniel removed in 1778 to "Fort Western settlement" (now raised for the purpose of protecting Long Island from invasion. He joined the northern army in 1777, was wounded at Fort Edward, and at Saratoga

M. Clarkson

Augusta, Me.). He had prepared himself before leaving Massachusetts for the profession of medicine, and was a successful practitioner for many years. He was in public life for several successive years as representative and senator in the general court and as a member of the executive council, and he was one of the electors that chose Washington president for his second term. He held the office of judge of the court of common pleas and of judge of probate from Kennebec county, and was a delegate to the convention that framed the constitution of Maine. Judge Cony in 1815 founded and liberally endowed the Cony female academy in Augusta (now the Cony high-school). His daughter married Nathan Weston, chief justice of common pleas in Massachusetts in 1810-'20, and subsequently chief justice and associate justice of the supreme court of Maine in 1820-'41, and a daughter by this marriage was the mother of Melville W. Fuller, chief justice of the United States.

COPE, Gilbert, genealogist, b. in East Bradford, Chester co., Pa., 17 Aug., 1840. He was educated at the Friends' select school in West Chester and at the Friends' boarding-school in Westtown, and for a few years followed farming. He is a member of the Pennsylvania historical society and of the New England historic-genealogical society, and has published "A Record of the Cope Family" (Philadelphia, 1860); "The Browns of Nottingham" (1864); "Genealogy of the Dutton Family" (West Chester, 1871); and, with J. Smith Futhery, "History of Chester County" (Philadelphia, 1881), and "Genealogy of the Sharpless Family" (1887).

CORBIN, Austin, financier, b. in Newport, N. H., 11 July, 1827. He was graduated at Harvard law-school in 1849, practised in his native village, and in 1852 removed to Davenport, Iowa, and in 1866 to New York, where he engaged in banking business, and in 1880 became president of the Long Island railroad. In 1886 he was chosen president of the Philadelphia and Reading railroad company. Mr. Corbin is actively associated in various organizations that have for their objects the development of artistic and philanthropic purposes in New York city.

CORNSTALK, Shawnee chief, b. in Mason county, Va. (now W. Va.), about 1720; d. in Point Pleasant, W. Va., in the summer of 1777. He was the chief of the Shawnee Indians, and at the battle of Point Pleasant, 10 Oct., 1774, his plan of alternate attack and retreat occasioned the principal loss of the whites. After the battle he convened his tribe to consult what must next be done, and, after upbraiding them for not suffering him to make peace with the settlers the day before the fight, struck his tomahawk in the post in the centre of the town-house and said: "I will go and make peace." He kept his treaty with the Americans till 1777, when the Shawnees, being incited by the British, began to disturb the frontier settlement. One day Cornstalk appeared at Point Pleasant, and, summoning the principal settlers, told them that he could make no secret of the disposition of the greater part of his tribe toward them, but that, although he was opposed to the British, he was afraid they would force him "to run with the stream." The council then determined to detain him as a hostage, and while in confinement he and his son were murdered by colonists in retaliation for an outrage by Indians. The governor offered a reward for the apprehension of the murderers, but without effect. Cornstalk was regarded as the ablest soldier among the Indians on the Virginia frontier.

COURTNEY, Frederick, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. in Plymouth, England, 5 Jan., 1837. He was educated in the Bluecoat school and at King's college, London, and, after holding pastorates in Kent, Plymouth, and Glasgow, was assistant at St. Thomas's church in New York from 1876 till 1880. He was rector in 1880-'2 of St. James church, Chicago, and then of St. Paul's, Boston. On 1 Feb., 1888, he was elected bishop of Nova Scotia.

COUSIN, Jean (coo-zang), French navigator, b. in Dieppe, lived in the latter part of the 15th century. His discoveries are related by Louis Estancelin in his "Recherches sur les voyages et découvertes des navigateurs Normands en Afrique, dans les Indes Orientales, et en Amérique" (Paris, 1832), Leon Guérin in his "Les navigateurs Français" (Paris, 1846), and Amans Alexis Monteil in his "Traité des matériaux manuscrits des divers genres d'histoire" (2 vols., Paris, 1835), and confirmed by the anonymous publication "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de Dieppe" (Dieppe, 1740), and by Francis Parkman in his "Pioneers of France in the New World" (Boston, 1860). According to these authorities, in 1488, four years before Columbus's voyage, Cousin, being at sea off the African coast, was forced westward by winds and currents to within sight of an unknown shore, where he presently descried the mouth of a great river (probably the Orinoco). On board his ship was one Pinzon, who, being dismissed for mutinous conduct, went to Spain, became known to Columbus, and accompanied him in his voyage of 1492. Cousin's discovery is also mentioned in the "Journal de l'Amérique" (Troyes, 1709) and in "Description des côtes de la mer Océane." It is also said that a French pilot discovered America. Unfortunately, the archives of the city of Dieppe were destroyed during the bombardment of 1694, and no information is now to be obtained there about Cousin's voyage to America, a narrative of which was undoubtedly deposited in the city archives.

COWEN, Esek, jurist, b. in Rhode Island, 24 Feb., 1787; d. in Albany, N. Y., 11 Feb., 1844. He was descended from John Cowen, a native of Scotland, who settled in Scituate, Mass., in 1656. His father's family removed in 1790 to Greenfield, Saratoga co. Four years afterward he removed to Hartford, Washington co., N. Y., and at sixteen years of age began the study of law, at the same time teaching during the winters. He was admitted to the bar in 1810, and began practice in Northumberland, N. Y. In 1812 he removed to Saratoga Springs, which was afterward his residence. He was reporter of the supreme court in 1821-'8, and was then appointed judge of the 4th circuit. In 1835 he was appointed to fill a vacancy in the supreme court, and continued in that office until his decease. Judge Cowen's opinion in the celebrated McLeod case, in connection with the Canadian rebellion, in which were discussed the question of perfect and imperfect war and other great national principles, attracted wide attention. Of his opinions in general it has been said that "in their depth and breadth of research, and their strength and reason of bearing, they are not excelled by any judge in England or America." He has frequently been compared to Lord Mansfield. Judge Cowen was more than six feet in height, and possessed great dignity of presence and unassuming manners. In 1812 he was one of the founders, in Northumberland, Saratoga co., N. Y., of the first temperance society in the United States. He was the author of "Civil Jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace in New York" (2 vols., 1844); "New York Reports, 1823-'8" (9 vols., 1824-'30); and a "Digested Index of Reports" (1831); and edited "Phillipps on Evidence" (5 vols., 1850).

COWLES, Augustus Woodruff, educator, b. in Reading, N. Y., 12 July, 1819. After graduation at Union college in 1841, he taught, studied theology in New York city, and in 1847-'56 was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Brockport. He was then made president of Elmira college, where he still remains. The degree of D. D. was given to him by Ingham university in 1858, and that of LL. D. by Hamilton college in 1886. Dr. Cowles was the first president of a college that was fully chartered expressly for the collegiate education of women, with a course of study honorably equivalent to the courses in colleges for men. He has gained considerable reputation as an artist, first introduced the special study of art criticism into a college curriculum, and has delivered free-hand illustrated lectures on art.

CURTIS, James Langdon, presidential candidate, b. in Stratford, Conn., 19 Feb., 1816. He was educated in his native town, and engaged in business in New York city, where, as colonel of the 9th regiment, he did good service in putting down the flour riots in 1835. He was nominated by the Labor party for governor of Connecticut in 1884, and in 1888 became the candidate of the National American party for president.

CUSHING, William, author, b. in Lunenburg, Worcester co., Mass., 15 May, 1811. His brother, Edmund Lambert (1807-'83), was chief justice of New Hampshire in 1874-'6. William was graduated at Harvard in 1832, and at the divinity-school there in 1839, and preached till 1857, when he removed to a farm in Clinton, Mass. He went to Cambridge in 1868, became library assistant in the Harvard library, and since 1878, when he was discharged, has engaged in literary pursuits. He spent several years in collecting material for a volume entitled "The Century of Authors, 1778-1880," the manuscript of which has been used in the preparation of this work. His published books are "Index to the North American Review" (Boston, 1878); "Index to the Christian Examiner" (1879); and "Initials and Pseudonyms" (1885-'8); and he has in preparation a work entitled "Anonyms." Another brother is Luther Stearns Cushing (vol. ii., p. 39).

DAME, Harriet Patience, nurse, b. in Barnstead, N. H., 5 Jan., 1815. Her parents moved to Barnstead about 1797, and in 1843 Miss Dame went to Concord, where she resided until the civil war. She joined the 2d New Hampshire regiment as hospital matron in June, 1861, and remained with it until it was mustered out in December, 1865. Miss Dame was inside the trenches at Fair Oaks, where she passed a dark night alone in the thick woods, the only woman in the brigade, caring for the wounded of other regiments as well as her own. She was on duty as nurse near the old stone church at Centreville while her regiment participated in the second battle of Bull Run. There she was taken prisoner, but was soon released. Miss Dame was appointed matron of the 18th army corps hospital in September, 1864, and had supervision of the nurses on duty. Of her services, Gen. Gilman Marston, who was long colonel of the 2d regiment, said: "Wherever the regiment went she went, often going on foot, and sometimes camping on the field without tent. . . . She was truly an angel of mercy, the bravest woman I ever knew. I have seen her face a battery without flinching. In August, 1867, she was appointed to a clerkship in the treasury department, where she still remains. In 1886 she deposited $1,000 with a committee of the 2d regiment veterans to erect a building for headquarters for their encampment at Lake Winnepiseogee, N. H.

DARWIN, Charles Robert, English naturalist, b. in Shrewsbury, England, 12 Feb., 1809; d. in Down, Kent, England, 18 April, 1882. He was a grandson of Dr.

Erasmus Darwin. Immediately after his graduation at Cambridge in 1831 he volunteered to accompany the ship "Beagle" as naturalist on an exploring expedition around the world, on which he was engaged till 2 Oct., 1836. Leaving the ship at Valparaiso, Darwin crossed the South American continent to Buenos Ayres, discovering on his way the gigantic fossil remains that first brought his name into notice. On his return he settled on a country estate in Kent, where he spent his life in scientific occupations, writing his remarkable works on botany and natural history, and propounding the theory of the origin of species by the natural selection of favorable variations, which soon became celebrated as the Darwinian theory. His writings that relate to this hemisphere include "Journal of Researches during a Voyage Around the World" (1839); "Geological Observations in South America" (1846); and many papers, such as "The Connection of Certain Volcanic Phenomena in South America." See "Darwin" by Grant Allen (1885), also "Life and Letters of Charles Darwin," by his son Francis Darwin (2 vols., New York, 1888).

DAVIN, Nicholas Flood, Canadian journalist, b. in Kilfinane, Ireland, 13 Jan., 1843. He was educated in London, and also studied at Queen's university, but never took a degree. In 1868 he was called to the English bar, and he has practised both in London and in Toronto. For five years he was a reporter in the gallery of the British house of commons, and also a contributor to the "Pall Mall Gazette." During the Franco-Prussian war he was correspondent of the "Irish Times" and the London "Standard." In 1872 he went to Canada, and he has there edited the Toronto "Globe" and "Mail," and in 1882 established the Regina "Leader," the first large paper in Assiniboia. He was sent by the Canadian government in 1879 to Washington to inquire into the working of the American system of educating Indian children. Subsequently he investigated the same subject in Winnipeg. In 1881-'2 he was secretary to the royal commission appointed to inquire into all matters connected with the Canadian Pacific railway, and in 1884-'5 was secretary to the Chinese commission, in which capacity he visited San Francisco, Cal., and Victoria, B. C. Mr. Davin served as a volunteer during the Canadian rebellion of 1885, and was elected to the parliament in 1887 from Western Assiniboia. He has published "The Irishman in Canada" (1877), and other works.

DAVIS, Alexander Jackson, architect, b. in New York, 24 July, 1803. He passed some time in the study of architecture, and in 1826 opened an office. He was in partnership with Ithiel Town in 1829-'43, and the two introduced many novelties and improvements in building in this country. Mr. Davis designed the executive department and patent-office in Washington (1834), the capitols of Illinois and Indiana (1837), Ohio (1839), and North Carolina, the University of Michigan, and the Virginia military institute. In 1831 he was elected an associate member of the National academy.

DAWSON, Aeneas MacDonell, Canadian author, b. in Redhaven, Scotland, 30 July, 1810. He was educated in Scotland and France, entered the Roman Catholic priesthood on 2 April, 1835, and has held charges in Canada. The University of Kingston gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1886. He is the author of "The Temporal Sovereignty of the Pope" (London, 1860); "Our Strength and their Strength" (Ottawa, 1870); "Life and Time of Pius IX." (1880); "The Last Defender of Jerusalem," a poem (1882); "Zenobia," a poem (1883); and several translations.

DELAND, Margaretta Wade, author, b. in Alleghany, Pa., 23 Feb., 1857. Her maiden name was Campbell. She was educated at Pelham priory, New Rochelle, N. Y., then studied at Cooper Union, and in 1878-'9 taught industrial design in the Girls' normal college. On 12 May, 1880, she married Lorin F. Deland, of Boston, Mass. Mrs. Deland has published "The Old Garden," a volume of verses (Boston, 1886), and "John Ward, Preacher," a novel that has attained great success (1888).

DEMAREST, Mary Augusta Lee, b. in New York city, 26 June, 1838; d. in Los Angeles, Cal., 8 Jan., 1888. She was a daughter of Thomas R. Lee, and became the wife of Theodore F. C. Demarest. For many years she was a resident of Passaic, N. J. Mrs. Demarest bequeathed $10,000 to various religious institutions. She was the author of many poems, a volume of which was published (New York, 1882). The best known of these is "My ain Countrie," which first appeared in the New York "Observer" in December, 1861.

DE VARENNES, Pierre Gauthier, Sieur de la Verendrye, French traveller, b. in France; d. in Quebec in 1749. He emigrated to Canada, and was for some time engaged in trading in peltry with the Indians. M. de Beauharnais, governor of Canada, originated a scheme to reach the Pacific, and its execution and expense were undertaken by De Varennes, who discovered the Rocky mountains in 1731. While on this tour he discovered, among massive stone pillars, a small stone bearing on two sides graven characters of an unknown language. The stone was afterward sent to Paris, and there the resemblance the characters were thought to bear to the Tartaric was regarded as supporting the hypothesis of an Asiatic immigration into America. The king of France conferred the cross of St. Louis upon De Varennes, and at the time of his death he was about to resume, by the king's desire, his attempt to reach the Pacific ocean.

DEWEY, Joel Allen, soldier, b. in Georgia, Franklin co., Vt., 20 Sept., 1840; d. in Knoxville, Tenn., 17 June, 1873. He entered Oberlin in 1858, but left in 1861 to enter the National army, and served as 1st lieutenant and captain of Ohio volunteers under Gen. John Pope in the west, and then with Gen. William T. Sherman. He was at one time on the staff of Gen. William S. Rosecrans. He became colonel of the 111th U. S. colored regiment in 1863, and led a brigade near Huntsville. He was captured near Athens, Ala., in September, 1864, after a day's severe engagement with Gen. Forrest's cavalry. After his liberation in November he served in Tennessee and northern Alabama till the close of the war. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 Dec., 1865, and was mustered out, 31 Jan., 1866, after declining a captain's commission in the regular army. Gen. Dewey then entered the law-school at Albany, N. Y., where he was graduated in 1867, and practised in Dandridge, Tenn. In 1869 he was elected attorney-general of the state, which office he held till his death.

DEWING, Thomas Wilmer, artist, b. in Boston, Mass., 4 May, 1852. He studied in 1876-'9 under Jules J. Lefebvre in Paris. His more important paintings are "Young Sorcerer" (1877); "Morning" (1879); "Prelude" (1883); "A Garden" (1884); "The Days," which gained the Clarke prize in 1887 (1884-'6); and "Tobias and the Angel" (1887). He has produced, among other portraits, those of Mrs. Lloyd Bryce, Mrs. Robert Goellet, and Mrs. Delancey Kane. He is a member of the Society of American artists, and was elected an associate member of the National academy in 1887, and an academician the year following.—His wife, Maria Richards, whose maiden name was Oakey, b. in New York, 27 Oct., 1855, studied at the National academy and under John Lafarge, and, in 1876, Thomas Couture. She has painted numerous figure- and flower-pieces, among which are "Violets" (1878) and "Mother and Child" (1880), and a number of portraits, including "Portrait of a Boy" (1875); "Portrait of her Father" (1877); and "Sleeping Child" (1878).

DICKINSON, Donald McDonald, cabinet officer, b. in Port Ontario, Oswego co., N. Y., 17 Jan., 1847. He was graduated at the University of Michigan in 1867, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and has been engaged in many important cases. He became chairman of the Democratic state committee of Michigan in 1876, and in 1880 was chairman of the Michigan delegation in the Democratic national convention. Since 1884 he has represented Michigan on the national Democratic committee. On 17 Jan., 1888, he became postmaster-general of the United States.

DOMEYKO, Ignaz, Chilian scientist, b. in Poland in 1802. He received his primary education in Cracow, and in 1817 continued his studies in the University of Vienna, where he was graduated. Taking part in the Polish insurrection of 1830-'1, he was obliged to emigrate to France, where he labored in the mines of Alsace, and afterward finished special studies at Paris. In 1838 he accepted the professorship of physics and chemistry at the lyceum of Serena, Chili. In 1846 he was called to the same chair in the National institute and the University of Chili, of which he was rector from 1876 till 1883. He was an associate editor of "El Araucano," "Los Anales de Minas," and "El Semanario de Santiago," and in 1888 began a scientific journey through Europe. He is the author of "Tratado de ensayes" (Serena, 1843; Santiago, 1873); "Elementos de Mineralogía" (1844); "La Araucania y sus habitantes" (1845); "Geología y Geometría Subterránea" (1873); "Excursión á las Cordilleras de Copiapó" (1875); and "Constitución Geológica de Chile" (1876).

DOOLITTLE, Charles Camp, soldier, b. in Burlington, Vt., 16 March, 1832. He was educated at the High-school in Montreal, Canada, but was not graduated on account of his removal to New York city in 1847. He subsequently went to Michigan, and on 16 May, 1861, became 1st lieutenant in the 4th Michigan regiment. He was made colonel of the 18th regiment of that state on 22 July, 1862, served in the peninsular campaign, and was slightly wounded at Gaines's Mills. He served in Kentucky in 1862-'3, and in Tennessee in 1863-'4, and was in command of Decatur, Ala., during the first day's successful defence of that town against Gen. John B. Hood. He led a brigade at Nashville, and was in command of that city in 1865, and of the north-eastern district of Louisiana in the autumn of that year. On 27 Jan., 1865, he was made brigadier-general of volunteers, and on 13 June he was brevetted major-general. He was mustered out on 30 Nov., at his own request, and since 1871 has been cashier of the Merchants' national bank, Toledo, Ohio.

DOUGHTY, John, soldier, b. in New Jersey about 1746; d. after 1802. He acted as commander of the American army by seniority of rank or by the appointment of Gen. Washington, from June, 1784, till September, 1789. There was no United States

Dowd attended conventions of railway managers in Boston, in New York, and in the west, and finally secured the adoption of the present system of railway standard time, which is a modification of his first plan. In this system the country is divided into sections, in each of which the time is made uniform, and the standards in adjacent sections differ by one hour. It went into effect on 18 Nov., 1883. Prof. Dowd received the degree of Ph. D. from the University of New York in 1888. He is writing "A Theory of Ethics."

DRAKE, Francis Marion, soldier, b. in Rushville, Schuyler co., Ill., 30 Dec., 1830. His father, John, a native of North Carolina, founded the town of Drakesville, Iowa. The son was educated in the district schools, and entered a mercantile life at sixteen years of age. He crossed the plains to Sacramento, Cal., in 1852 and 1854, engaged in Indian warfare, and in 1859 settled in business in Unionville, Iowa. He served through the civil war, becoming in 1862 lieutenant-colonel of the 36th Iowa cavalry, was severely wounded at Mark's Mills, and in 1865 was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. He re-entered mercantile life at the end of the war, and was admitted to the bar in 1866, but subsequently engaged in railroad-building. In 1881 he became a founder of Drake university, contributing the principal amount.

ELKIN, William Lewis, astronomer, b. in New Orleans, La., 29 April, 1855. He was educated at the Royal polytechnic school in Stuttgart, Germany, and was graduated at the University of Strasburg in 1880. Subsequently he was associated with Dr. David Gill, of the Royal observatory at the Cape of Good Hope, in investigating the parallaxes of southern stars. In 1884 he became an astronomer at the observatory of Yale university, which post he still holds. His investigations at this place have included a triangulation of the Pleiades with the heliometer, and other researches with that instrument, the only one of its kind in America; also researches on the parallaxes of northern stars. These results have been published in current astronomical journals, and have given Dr. Elkin wide reputation among astronomers.

ESTE, George Peabody, soldier, b. in Nashua, N. H., 24 April, 1829; d. in New York city, 6 Feb., 1881. He wrote his family name Estey till he entered the army, when he adopted an older spelling. He entered Dartmouth, but left on account of illness before graduation, and, after going to California, studied law, and settled in Toledo, where he became a partner of Morrison R. Waite. He was solicitor of his county in 1860, but, entering the National service as a private, became lieutenant-colonel of the 14th Ohio infantry, and in 1862 succeeded to the command. During the Atlanta campaign and afterward he led a brigade, and at Jonesboro' he averted defeat by a timely bayonet charge. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 9 Dec., 1864, and on 26 June, 1865, was given full rank. Gen. Este resigned on 4 Dec., 1865, and afterward practised his profession in Washington, D. C. He was presented by his regiment with a sword with diamond-studded hilt.

FERMOY, Matthias Alexis Roche de, French soldier, b. in the West Indies about 1737; d. after 1778. He was 34th on the list of Continental brigadier-generals, his commission dating 5 Nov., 1776. On coming to this country in that year and offering his services to congress, Fermoy represented him-army during that period, except two companies of artillery, the Continental army having been disbanded and the new army not formed. He became major of an artillery company in 1789, lieutenant-colonel of artillery and engineers in June, 1798, and on 26 May, 1800, he resigned. Col. Doughty, in 1785, built Fort Harmar, at the junction of the Muskingum with the Ohio river (the site of Marietta), which was the first post of the kind within the bounds of Ohio. In 1790 he built Fort Washington, consisting of hewn-log cabins with connecting palisades, where now stands the city of Cincinnati. It was between the present Third and Fourth streets, and is represented in the illustration.

DOWD, Charles Ferdinand, educator, b. in Madison, Conn., 25 April, 1825. He was graduated at Yale in 1853, and has successively held the posts of principal of the preparatory department of Newton university, Baltimore, Md., professor of mathematics there, principal of the high-school, Waterbury, Conn., associate principal of the Connecticut normal school at New Britain, superintendent of public schools, Waterbury, Conn., principal of the Granville (N. Y.) military academy, and president of Temple Grove seminary, Saratoga Springs, N. Y. He conceived the idea of adopting one standard for railway time, and after submitting it to a railway convention in New York city in October, 1869, he devised a complete plan, which he published, with a map (1870). Prof.

self as a colonel of engineers in the French army. He served under Washington in the Trenton-Princeton campaign. On 1 Jan., 1777, he was ordered to take his brigade to hold an advanced post at Mile-Run, beyond Maiden-Head (now Lawrenceville). That same night he returned to Trenton, leaving his command in a somewhat questionable way. The following year (1777) he was placed in command of Fort Independence, opposite Fort Ticonderoga, by orders of congress, and against the protest of Washington. On the retreat of Gen. Arthur St. Clair from Ticonderoga, Fermoy, against the orders of the commanding general, set fire to his quarters on Mount Independence at two o'clock on the morning of 6 July, 1777, thus revealing to Burgoyne St. Clair's evacuation of Ticonderoga. Had it not been for this, St. Clair would have made good his retreat in safety. In December, 1777, he applied for promotion to a major-generalship, but congress, on 31 Jan., 1778, refused his request, and on 16 Feb., 1778, he was allowed to resign, receiving $800 to enable him to return to the West Indies.

FIELD, William Hildreth, lawyer, b. in New York city, 16 April, 1843. He was graduated at Union college in 1863, and at Columbia college law-school in 1865. He was taken into partnership by Judge John W. Edmonds, and remained with him until his death in 1874. He was elected president of the Catholic club of New York in June, 1887, and re-elected in 1888. Under his management this body has become the most influential Roman Catholic organization in the state. He has tried many cases before the court of appeals, some of great public importance, involving the interpretation of statutes, in which the law has been settled in accordance with the construction that he advocated. He edited, with Judge Edmonds, "Statutes at Large of the State of New York" (9 vols., Albany, 1863-'75).

FLETCHER, Alice Cunningham, ethnologist, b. in Boston, Mass., about 1845. She was carefully educated, and, after study among the archaeological remains of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys, went in 1881 to reside among the Omaha Indians, investigating their customs and traditions under the auspices of the Peabody museum of American archaeology and ethnology of Harvard. In 1883 she was appointed by the secretary of the interior to allot the Omahas their lands in severalty, and brought to the Indian schools at Carlisle, Pa., and Hampton, Va., a large party of their children and two married couples. Under the care of the Woman's national Indian association, Miss Fletcher established a system by which small sums of money were lent to such Indians as wished to buy tracts of land and build houses. At the request of the Indian bureau, she prepared an exhibit for the New Orleans exposition in 1884-'5 showing the progress of Indian civilization for the last twenty-five years. In 1886 she was sent by the commissioner of education to visit Alaskan and Aleutian Indians, and in 1888 completed her report on "Indian Education and Civilization," in which is a synopsis of all Indian treaties, their laws and regulations, and statistics concerning population, schools, etc. (Washington, 1888). In 1887 she was appointed special agent, and assigned to the Winnebago tribe. She has published numerous papers and monographs.

Flickinger, Daniel Kumler, bishop of the United Brethren, b. in Sevenmile, Ohio, 25 May, 1824. He received an academic education, became corresponding secretary of the United-Brethren church missionary society in 1857, and held office by re-election till 1885, when he was chosen foreign missionary bishop. He has made eight missionary tours to Africa, and done work on the frontiers of the United States and among Chinese emigrants. Otterbein university, Ohio, gave him the degree of D. D. in 1875. Dr. Flickinger has published "Off-Hand Sketches in Africa" (Dayton, Ohio, 1857); "Sermons," with Rev. William J. Shuey (1859); "Ethiopia, or Twenty-six Years of Missionary Life in Western Africa" (1877); and "The Church's Marching Orders" (1879).

FLOOD, James Clair, capitalist, b. in Ireland in 1825. He emigrated to New York when a young man in the same ship with William O'Brien, with whom he formed an intimate friendship during the voyage. After working in ship-yards the two went to California in 1851, and opened a saloon in San Francisco. They made money by speculating in mining stock, and several years later formed a partnership with James G. Fair and John W. Mackay, who were then young miners. Flood and O'Brien agreed to furnish money for tools and outfit, while Fair and Mackay prospected in the Sierras. The result was the discovery of the Comstock lode, which made them four of the wealthiest men in the world. They subsequently established the Nevada bank in San Francisco, and the partnership continued till 1881, when Mr. Fair was elected to the U. S. senate. Soon afterward Mr. Flood withdrew from active business.

FOLEY, John Samuel, R. C. bishop, b. in Baltimore, Md., 5 Nov., 1833. He was graduated at St. Mary's college, Baltimore, in 1850, studied theology there and in Rome, and was ordained a priest, 20 Dec., 1856. After filling several appointments in Maryland, he was commissioned by Archbishop Spalding to establish a new congregation in the western part of Baltimore, and built for it the Church of St. Martin, one of the finest in the city, also taking an active interest in educational matters. Dr. Foley was employed on important private missions by Archbishop Spalding and Cardinal Gibbons, and had much influence in the Baltimore council of 1884. He was appointed to the see of Detroit 5 Aug. 1888. He is a brother of Thomas Foley, bishop of Chicago (q. v.).

FOULON, Clément, known as Father CLAUDE D'ABBEVILLE, French missionary, b. in Abbeville, Somme, about 1557; d. in Paris in 1632. In 1612 he accompanied Commander Isaac de Razilly to South America, and, after exploring the northern shore of Brazil, began a small settlement on the island of Maranhão, near the coast. Returning to France a few months later, he vainly solicited aid from the church, and in 1614 recalled the three missionaries that he had left on Marañon island. He was a preacher of much repute, and for many years the superior of the convent of Capucins at Abbeville which he had founded. He published "Histoire de la mission des P. P. Capucins à l'île de Maragnon et terres circonvoisines" (Paris, 1614).

FULLER, Melville Weston, jurist, b. in Augusta, Me., 11 Feb., 1833. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1853, studied law in Bangor with his uncle, George M. Weston, and then at Harvard, and began to practise in 1855 in his native city. There he was an associate editor of the "Age," served as president of the common council, and became city attorney in 1856; but he resigned in June of that year, and removed to Chicago, Ill., where he was in active practice for thirty-two years. He rose to the highest rank in his profession, and was concerned in many important cases, among which were the National bank tax cases, one of which was the first that was argued before Chief-Justice Waite, the Cheney ecclesiastical case, the South park commissioners cases, and the Lake front case. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1862, and in 1863-'5 of the lower house of the legislature, where he was a leader of the Douglas branch of the Democratic party. He was a delegate to the Democratic national conventions of 1864, 1872, 1876, and 1880. On 30 April, 1888, he was nominated by President Cleveland to be chief justice of the United States, and on 20 July he was confirmed by the senate. On 8 Oct. he took the oath of office and entered on his duties. Judge Fuller is, with one exception, the youngest member of the supreme court. He has attained reputation as a speaker. Among his addresses is one welcoming Stephen A. Douglas to Chicago in 1860, and another on Sidney Breese, which is prefixed to Judge Breese's "Early History of Illinois" (1884). The degree of LL. D. has been conferred on him by the Northwestern university, and Bowdoin college in 1888.

FULLER, Thomas, Canadian architect, b. in Bath, England, 8 March, 1822. He was educated in his native place, and, after leaving school, was articled to an architect there, subsequently studying his profession in London. At an early age he was intrusted with the erection of a cathedral at Antigua, West Indies. In 1857 he went to Toronto, Canada, and formed a partnership with Chilion Jones. In 1859 their designs were accepted by the government for the parliament and departmental buildings and governor-general's residence at Ottawa. (See illustration of the capitol.) In the competition for the new capitol for the state of New York, at Albany, his design was one of the three to which equal premiums were awarded. In the second competition, to which the three successful competitors were invited, Augustus Laver, one of the three, prepared a joint design with Mr. Fuller which was ultimately adopted in 1867. Mr. Fuller remained in New York state until 1881, when he returned to Ottawa, and on 9 Dec. of that year he was appointed chief architect of the Dominion of Canada.

GAMBLE, William, soldier, b. in Duross, County Tyrone, Ireland, 1 Jan., 1818; d. in Nicaragua, Central America, 20 Dec., 1866. He studied civil engineering, and was employed on the government survey of the north of Ireland, but came to the United States when he was twenty years old, and enlisted in the 1st U. S. dragoons. He served in the Florida war and on the western frontier, and rose to be sergeant-major, but on the expiration of his term of enlistment went to Chicago, Ill., where he followed his profession. At the beginning of the civil war he enlisted in the 8th Illinois cavalry, was chosen its lieutenant-colonel, afterward was promoted colonel, and fought with the Army of the Potomac, receiving a wound at Malvern Hill that was nearly fatal. He was for two years at the head of a brigade in defence of Washington, with headquarters at Fairfax Court-House, Va., and on 25 Sept., 1865, was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. After service in the west he was mustered out of the volunteer service on 13 March, 1866, and on 28 July accepted a major's commission in the 8th regular cavalry. He was on his way with his regiment to California when he died of cholera.

GARIBALDI, Giuseppe, Italian patriot, b. in Nice, 4 July, 1807; d. in Caprera, 2 June, 1882. He followed the sea from his earliest youth, and in 1836 went to Rio Janeiro, where he engaged in the coasting trade. In 1837 he offered his services to the revolted Brazilian province of

Rio Grandedo Sul, and commanded a fleet of gun-boats. After many daring exploits he was forced to burn his vessels, and went to Montevideo, where he became a broker and teacher of mathematics. He took service in Uruguay in the war against Rosas, and was given the command of a small naval force which he was obliged to abandon after a battle at Costa

G. Garibaldi

Brava, 15 and 16 June, 1842. Garibaldi then organized the famous Italian legion, with which for four years he fought numerous battles for the republic. In 1845 he commanded an expedition to Salto, where he established his headquarters, and toward the end of the year he resisted with 500 men for three days the assault of Urquiza's army of 4,000 men. On 8 Feb., 1846, he repelled at San Antonio, with scarcely 200 men, Gen. Servando Gomez with 1,200 soldiers. In 1847, when he heard of Italy's rising against Austrian dominion, he went to assist his country, accompanied by a portion of the Italian legion; but, after taking part in several unsuccessful attempts, including the defence of Rome against the French in 1849, he sailed in June, 1850, for New York. On Staten island he worked for a time with a countryman manufacturing candles and soap, and in 1851 he went by way of Central America and Panama to Callao, whence he sailed in 1852 in command of a vessel for China. Early in 1854 he returned to Italy, where he lived quietly in the island of Caprera. At the opening of war against Austria in 1859 he organized the Alpine chasseurs, and defeated the enemy in several encounters. After the peace of Villafranca he began preparations for the expedition which was secretly encouraged by the government. Having conquered Sicily and being proclaimed dictator, he entered Naples in triumph on 7 Sept., 1860, but afterward resigned the dictatorship and proclaimed

Victor Emmanuel king of Italy, declining all proffered honors and retiring to Caprera. In 1862 he planned the rescue of Rome from the French, and again invaded Calabria from Sicily, but was wounded and captured at Aspromonte, 29 Aug., 1862, and sent back to Caprera. In June, 1866, during the Austro-Prussian war, he commanded for a short time an army of volunteers, and on 14 Oct., 1867, he undertook another expedition to liberate Rome, but was routed by the Papal troops and the French. He entered the service of the French republic in 1870, and he organized and commanded the chassours of the Vosges. In 1871 he was elected to the Italian parliament, and took an active part in politics till the end of his life. In 1888 the Italians in New York erected a bronze statue of him which was unveiled in Washington square, 4 June, 1888. He wrote several novels, including "Cantoni il volontario" (Genoa, 1870); "Clelia, ovvero il governo monaco; Roma del secolo XIX" (1870), which in the same year was translated into English under the title of "The Rule of the Monk, or Rome in the 19th Century"; "Il frate dominatore" (1873); and a poem, "Le Mila di Marsala" (1873). Many biographies of Garibaldi have been written and translated into English, including those by W. Robson (London, 1860), by Theodore Dwight (New York, 1860), and by Mrs. Gaskell (London, 1862). An autobiography appeared after his death, under the title "Garibaldi; Memorie autobiografiche" (Florence, 1888).

GERHARDT, Karl, sculptor, b. in Boston, Mass., 7 Jan., 1853. He is of German parentage, and in early life was a machinist in Chicopee, Mass., and then a designer of machinery in Hartford, Conn. His first works were a bust of his wife and "A Startled Bather," which so strongly indicated talent that he was sent to Paris for study. In his second year he contributed to the salon, where he also exhibited in 1884 "Echo," a statuette, and "Eve's Lullaby," a life-size group. His other works include a bust of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, taken in the last days of his illness; busts of Samuel L. Clemens (1883) and the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher (1886); a statue of Nathan Hale (see vol. iii., p. 31) in the state capitol at Hartford (1885); an equestrian statue of Gen. Israel Putnam in Brooklyn, Conn. (1887); a statue of Josiah Bartlett, signer of the Declaration of Independence, in Amesbury, Mass. (1888); Welton Fountain, Waterbury, Conn. (1888); statue of Gen. Gouverneur K. Warren (see p. 362) at Gettysburg, Pa. (1888); and tablet to John Fitch, in the state capitol in Hartford, Conn. (1888).

GIBSON, Robert Williams, architect, b. in Aveley, Essex, England, 17 Nov., 1854. He was educated at a private school in Gravesend, and then at the Royal academy of arts in London, where he completed his course in 1879. Subsequently he settled in New York city, where he has since followed his profession. His work includes the U. S. trust company's building in New York city and the Cathedral church in Buffalo, and he has submitted a design for the projected cathedral of the Protestant Episcopal church to be built in New York city. Mr. Gibson's best-known work is the cathedral of All Saints' in Albany, which is shown in the illustration, the design of which was selected in competition. This church, although not completed, was dedicated on 20 Nov., 1888, with appropriate ceremonies, extending through an entire week. He published in the "American Architect," during 1884, a series of articles on "Spanish Architecture," with illustrations made by himself in Spain, and, in the "Engineering Record," "Observations on Heavy Buildings" (1888).

GILBERG, Charles Alexander, chess-player, b. in Camden, N. J., 17 June, 1835. He was graduated at the College of the city of New York in 1854, and is the managing partner in a large West India house in that city. He is widely known as an amateur chess-player, and has served as judge in almost every public contest that has taken place. His chess library of more than 1,500 volumes is the largest in this country with the exception of that of John G. White, of Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. Gilberg has received prizes for his chess problems, and has edited "American Chess-Nuts" (New York, 1868) and "The Book of the Fifth American Congress" (1881).

GILBERT, Samuel Augustus, soldier, b. in Zanesville, Ohio, 25 Aug., 1825; d. in St. Paul, Minn., 9 June, 1868. He was educated at Ohio university, Athens, Ohio, and then entered the U. S. coast survey, in which service he continued until the civil war, attaining a rank next to that of superintendent. On 11 June, 1861, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 24th Ohio volunteers, and accompanied his regiment to western Virginia. He was appointed colonel of the 44th Ohio regiment on 14 Oct., 1861, and in May, 1862, he took part in the raid upon the Central railroad, in which he marched more than eighty miles in sixty hours, including all stops. He commanded the right in the battle of Lewisburg, W. Va., 21 May, 1862, and captured a Confederate battery. In August, 1862, he was ordered to join Gen. John Pope east of the Blue Ridge, and he served there until 1863, when he commanded a brigade in Kentucky, and dispersed a political convention in Frankfort which he considered to be plotting treason. He continued in Kentucky and Tennessee until November, 1863, when he became engineer on the staff of Gen. John G. Foster until Gen. James Longstreet retreated, when he resumed command of his brigade. Col. Gilbert's health having been impaired by exposure, he resigned on 20 April, 1864. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865.

GILCHRIST, Robert, lawyer, b. in Jersey City, N. J., 21 Aug., 1825; d. there, 6 July, 1888. He was educated in private schools, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1847. Subsequently he became a counsellor of the U. S. supreme court. He was a member of the New Jersey legislature in 1859. At the first call for troops in 1861 he went to the front as a captain in the 2d New Jersey regiment. Until the close of the civil war he was a Republican, but he left that party on the question of reconstruction, and in 1866 he was a Democratic candidate for congress. In 1869 he was appointed attorney-general of New Jersey, to fill the unexpired term of George M. Robeson (appointed secretary of the navy in President Grant's cabinet), and in 1873 was reappointed for a full term. In 1875 he was a candidate for U. S. senator. He had been appointed one of the commissioners to revise the constitution of the state in 1873, but resigned before the work was completed, and he also declined the office of chief-justice of New Jersey. Mr. Gilchrist was especially versed in constitutional law, and he was employed in many notable cases. His interpretation of the fifteenth amendment to the national constitution secured the right of suffrage to colored men in New Jersey. He was the author of the riparian-rights act, and was counsel for the state in the suit that tested its constitutionality. From this source the fund for maintenance of public schools in New Jersey is now chiefly derived. He also secured to the United States a half million dollars left by Joseph L. Lewis to be applied in payment of the national debt. His large law library, enriched with thousands of marginal notes, was sold at auction in New York six months after his death.—His wife, FREDERICKA, b. in Oswego, N. Y., in 1846, is a daughter of Samuel Raymond Beardsley (q. v.). She has published "The True Story of Hamlet and Ophelia," a minute study and completely new interpretation of Shakespeare's play (Boston, 1889).

GILPIN, William, governor of Colorado, b. in Newcastle county, Del., 4 Oct., 1812. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1833, studied at the U. S. military academy, and served in the Seminole war, but resigned his commission and removed to Independence, Mo., in 1841, where he practised law, which he had studied under his brother. He was secretary of the general assembly in 1841-'3. On 4 March, 1844, with a party of 125 pioneers, he founded Portland, Ore., about four miles above its present site, and drew up the articles of agreement for a territorial government. He afterward re-entered the army, serving through the Mexican war as major of the 1st Missouri cavalry, and in 1848 he made a successful expedition against the hostile Indians of Colorado, which resulted in a peace for eighteen years. In 1851 he returned to Independence, and in 1861 he was appointed first governor of Colorado. Gov. Gilpin has published "The Central Gold Region" (Philadelphia, 1859) and "The Mission of the North American People" (1873). In the latter he showed by charts the practicability of establishing a railroad around the world on the 40th parallel of latitude, on which are located nearly all the great cities of both continents.

GOMARA, Francisco Lopez de (go-mah'-rah), Spanish historian, b. in Seville, or, according to some authorities, in Gomera, Canary islands, in 1510; d. in Seville in 1560 or 1576. His parents had destined him for a military career, but he took holy orders, and was employed for several years as professor of rhetoric at Alcalá. Desiring to acquire a personal knowledge of the New World, he went to Mexico about 1540, and remained there four years, part of the time as secretary of Hernán Cortés. On his return he resided for some time in Italy, and became intimate with Saxo Grammaticus and Olaus Magnus. His work is entitled "Primera y segunda parte de la historia general de las Indias con la conquista de México y de la Nueva España" (Medina, 1553; Antwerp, 1554). It had great success, passing in quick succession through two editions, and was translated into Italian by Gravalis (Rome, 1566) and by Lucio Mauro (Venice, 1566), and into French by Martin Fumée (Paris, 1606). The second part, which is a history of the life of Cortés, has been reprinted by Bustamante (Mexico, 1826). Gomara's style is clear and fluent, but, unfortunately, the second part of his work seems to have been written from notes, which were not complete or exact, and often supplied by a fervid imagination. In the royal library of Madrid there are two of his works in manuscript, "Historia de Horuc y Aradin Barbaroja, reyes de Argel" and "Anales del Emperador Carlos V.," the publication of which has not been permitted by the royal government, because they depict the emperor's character in an unfavorable light.

GOODSELL, Daniel Ayres, M. E. bishop, b. in Newburg, N. Y., 5 Nov., 1840. He was educated at the University of the city of New York, but left before graduation to enter the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church. He was a delegate to every general conference from 1876 till 1888, and at the one in New York city in May, 1888, he was elected bishop. Wesleyan university conferred on him the degree of S. T. D. in 1880. Bishop Goodsell has been literary editor and editorial contributor of the New York "Christian Advocate" since 1880, and was an editorial contributor of the "Methodist Review" until May, 1888.

GOODWIN, Isaac, author, b. in Plymouth, Mass., 28 June, 1786; d. in Worcester, Mass., 16 Sept., 1832. He was educated in Plymouth, studied law there, practised his profession, and held local offices in Stirling and Worcester, Mass. From 1813 till 1832 he was a member and councillor of the American antiquarian society of Worcester. Besides many addresses and orations, he published "History of the Town of Stirling, Mass." (Worcester, 1815); "The Town Officer" (1824); and "The New England Sheriff" (1830).—His son, John Abbott, author, b. in Stirling, Mass., 21 May, 1824; d. in Lowell, Mass., 21 Sept., 1884, was educated at the Rensselaer polytechnic institute in the class of 1847, but was not graduated. He was in the Massachusetts legislature in 1854-'7 and 1859-'61, serving in the last years as speaker of the house, held local offices in Lowell, and delivered many speeches. Among his publications are "The Pilgrim Fathers neither Puritans nor Persecutors" (Lowell, 1875) and "The Pilgrim Republic" (Boston, 1888).

GOTTHEIL, Gustave, clergyman, b. in Pinne, Poland, 28 May, 1827. He is of Jewish parentage, was educated according to the rabbinical code, attended lectures in the University of Berlin and at the institute for Hebrew literature, and in 1855 became assistant minister to the celebrated Dr. Samuel Holdheim of the Berlin reform temple. He was called to Manchester, England, in 1860, and to Temple Emanuel, New York city, in 1873. Dr. Gottheil is a liberal in his religious opinions, and a leader in the reform branch of the Hebrew church. He has been active in educational, social, and charitable reforms, contributing many papers on these subjects to the reviews. He is the author of "Hymns and Anthems" (New York, 1887).

GREER, David Hummell, clergyman, b. in Wheeling, W. Va., 20 March, 1844. He was graduated at Washington college, Pa., in 1862, studied theology at the Protestant Episcopal seminary at Gambier, Ohio, was ordered deacon in Christ church, Clarksburg, W. Va., in June, 1866, and remained in charge of that parish for a year. He was ordained priest at Alexandria, Va., in 1868, and became rector of Trinity church, Covington, Ky. He went abroad in 1871, and on his return was elected rector of Grace church, Providence, R. I., and entered upon his work there on 15 Sept., 1872. He organized several missions in connection with the parish church, founded St. Elizabeth's home for incurables in 1882, and was deputy from the diocese to four successive general conventions. He accepted the rectorship of St. Bartholomew's church, New York city, in 1888. He is a broad-churchman, and an eloquent extemporaneous preacher.

GRIFFIN, Samuel P., navigator, b. in Savannah, Ga., in 1826; d. in Aspinwall, Panama, 4 July, 1887. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1841, served throughout the Mexican war in Californian waters, and in 1849 was in the first U. S. arctic expedition that was sent out to search for Sir John Franklin. He resigned from the navy in 1854, engaged in business in New Orleans, and during the civil war was detailed by Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks to collect a fleet for the Red river expedition. He soon afterward entered the service of the Pacific mail steamship company, commanding, as their commodore, successive steamers of their fleet till 1882. Capt. Griffin was an authority on ship-building, and the author of the code of international fog-signals and of essays on ship-building.

GRISWOLD, Alphonso Miner, journalist, b. in Westmoreland, Oneida co., N. Y., 26 Jan., 1834. He was educated at Hamilton college and became a journalist in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, and Cincinnati. His paragraphs and humorous essays under the pen-name of "The Fat Contributor" won him reputation, and he spent the years 1865-'78 in the lecture field, his topics being "American Antiquities," "Injun Meal," and "Queer Folks." In 1872-'83 he owned the Cincinnati "Saturday Night," a humorous literary journal, and since 1886 he has been an editor and one of the proprietors of "Texas Siftings."

GUINEY, Louise Imogen (gui'-ny), poet, b. in Boston, Mass., 7 Jan., 1861. Her father, Patrick R. Guiney, served in the National army during the civil war, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers in 1864, and died from the effects of a wound that he received in the battle of the Wilderness. Louise was graduated at Elmhurst academy, Providence, R. I., in 1879, and early contributed verses to papers. Her publications are "Songs at the Start" (Boston, 1884); "Goose-Quill Papers" (1885); "The White Sail, and other Poems" (1887); and "Brownies and Bogles" (1888).

GUNN, Frederick William, educator, b. in Washington, Litchfield co., Conn., 4 Oct., 1816; d. there, 10 Aug., 1881. He was graduated at Yale in 1837, taught in New Preston, Conn., and subsequently in Towanda, Pa., with Orville H. Platt. In 1850 he established in Washington, Conn., the boys' boarding-school that is now known as the Gunnery. His unique methods and the homelike character of the school soon won it a wide reputation, and he continued in its charge till his death. The school is described in Josiah G. Holland's novel entitled "Arthur Bonnicastle" as the "Bird's Nest," and also in William Hamilton Gibson's "Snug Hamlet." See also "The Master of the Gunnery" (New York, 1884).

HADDOCK, George Channing, clergyman, b. in Watertown, N. Y., 23 Jan., 1832; d. in Sioux City, Iowa, 3 Aug., 1886. He was partially educated at Black river institute in his native town, learned the printer's trade, and was connected with several Republican newspapers in Wisconsin. He was licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal church in 1859, and from 1860 until 1882 was actively engaged in temperance work and in opposing Spiritualism. He was transferred to the Iowa conference in 1882, and while endeavoring to enforce the prohibition laws of that state was assassinated in Sioux City. Besides pamphlets and tracts, he published several fugitive poems that became popular, including "Autumn Leaves," "The Skeleton Guest," and "The Cross of Gold." See his "Life" by his son (New York, 1887).

HALL, Anne, artist, b. in Pomfret, Conn., 26 May, 1792; d. in New York city, 11 Dec., 1863. She was the sister of Jonathan Prescott Hall (vol. iii., p. 42). She took some lessons in applying colors to ivory from Samuel King, who taught Washington Allston, and received instruction in oil-painting from Alexander Robertson, in New York, and John Trumbull, but soon turned her entire attention to miniature painting, in which she became celebrated. She was elected a member of the National academy of design, where she occasionally exhibited. Her miniature portrait of Garafilia Mohalbi, the Greek girl, has been considered her masterpiece, and has been engraved repeatedly. Her beautiful picture of Dr. John W. Francis's son John has been long engraved under the name of "Oberon." Her miniatures are scattered widely over the country, but many of the best are in the possession of her relatives in New York; her nephew, Col. John Ward, owning those of Garafilia, and Lieut. Col. Samuel Ward.

HALL, Granville Stanley, psychologist, b. in Ashfield, Mass., 6 May, 1845. He was graduated at Williams in 1867, was professor of psychology at Antioch college, Ohio, in 1872-'6, studied in Berlin, Bonn, Heidelberg, and Leipsic, and was lecturer on psychology at Harvard in 1876 and again in 1881-'2, becoming professor of that branch at Johns Hopkins in 1882. In 1888 he accepted the presidency of Clark university, Worcester, Mass. Harvard gave him the degree of Ph. D. in 1876. Prof. Hall has written extensively for periodicals on psychological and educational topics, and is editor of the "American Journal of Psychology," and the author of "Aspects of German Culture" (Boston, 1881); and, with John M. Mansfield, "Hints toward a Select and Descriptive Bibliography of Education" (1886).

HALLOCK, Charles, journalist, b. in New York city, 13 March, 1834. He is the son of Gerard Hallock (vol. iii., p. 52). He studied at Yale in 1850-'1 and at Amherst in 1851-'2, receiving his degree from the latter in 1871, was associate editor and proprietor of the New York "Journal of Commerce" from 1855 till 1862, financial editor of "Harper's Weekly" from 1868, and founder and proprietor of "Forest and Stream" from 1873 till 1880. In 1877 he prepared a glossary of provincial and quaint words. In 1884-'5 he illustrated frontier life on the Canadian border by an exhibit of life-size groups at the New Orleans exposition. Mr. Hallock was an incorporator and director of the Flushing and Queens county bank, New York, and a money broker and commission merchant in St. John and Halifax for several years. His business ventures have included sunflower culture for the oil product, the restoration of abandoned New England farms, sheep culture in the north-west on Indian model farms, a farm colony for sportsmen in Minnesota, the development of Alaska, the substitution of porous terra-cotta for adobe and titipati in Mexico, a crematory for burning garbage, a smoke-consumer and coal-saver, and many other economic schemes. He has published "The Fishing Tourist" (New York, 1873); "Life of Stonewall Jackson"; "The Humorist"; "Camp Life in Florida" (1875); "The Sportsman's Gazetteer" (1877); and "Our New Alaska" (1886).

HAND, Daniel, philanthropist, b. in Madison, Conn., in 1801. For many years he was a merchant in Augusta, Ga., and Charleston, S. C., where he accumulated a fortune. After the civil war he retired and returned to the north, where he became known as a philanthropist, his first gift being a high-school building to his native town. In 1888 he gave to the American missionary association more than $1,000,000, to be held in trust and known as the Daniel Hand educational fund for colored people, to be used in the "states in which slavery was recognized in 1861." Mr. Hand has for many years lived in Guilford, Conn.

HARRISON, Benjamin, president-elect of the United States, b. in North Bend, Ohio, 20 Aug., 1833. He is the third son of John Scott Harrison (who was a son of President Harrison), and was born in his grandfather's house. John Scott Harrison was a farmer, and in early life cared for his own little plantation and assisted his father in the management of the family property. This occupation he varied by boating to New Orleans, whither he went almost every year with a cargo of produce of his own raising. Benjamin passed his boyhood in the usual occupations of a farmer's son—feeding the cattle and aiding in the harvesting of the crops. He received his early education in an old-fashioned log school-house fronting on the Ohio river. Subsequently he was sent to a school called Farmer's college, on College hill, near Cincinnati, where he spent two years, and then went to Miami university, where he was graduated in 1852. While at college he formed an attachment for Miss Caroline L. Scott, whose father at that time was president of the Female seminary in Oxford. Among his classmates were Milton Sayler, who took first honors, and David Swing, who stood second, while Harrison was fourth. His graduating oration was on "The Poor of England." He entered the law office of Storer and Gwynne in Cincinnati, and on 20 Oct., 1853, before the completion of his studies and before attaining his majority, he was married. In March, 1854, he settled in Indianapolis, Ind., which has since been his place of residence. He obtained desk-room with John H. Rea, and announced himself to the world as attorney at law. Through the kindness of friends, he was soon appointed crier of the Federal court, the salary of which in term-time was $2.50 a day. The money that he received for these services was the first that he earned. The story of his earliest case is typical of the man. An indictment for burglary had been found against an individual, and Harrison was intrusted with the making of the final argument. The court was held at night, and the room was dimly lighted with candles. He had taken full notes of the evidence, which he had intended to read from, and, after his opening remarks, he turned to his papers, but, owing to the imperfect light, was unable to decipher them. A moment's embarrassment followed, but quickly casting aside his notes and trusting to his memory, he continued. The verdict was in his favor, and with this first success came increased business and reputation. Soon afterward Gov. Joseph A. Wright intrusted him with a legislative investigation, which he conducted successfully. In 1855 he was invited by William Wallace to become his partner. He is described at that time as "quick of apprehension, clear, methodical, and logical in his analysis and statement of a case." This connection continued until 1860, when it was succeeded by that of Harrison and Fishback.

In 1860 his first entry into active politics took place with his nomination by the Republicans for the office of reporter of the supreme court. He canvassed the state for his party, and in Rockville, Parke county, he spoke at a meeting where Thomas A. Hendricks, the Democratic candidate for governor, was his opponent. He had already attained reputation as an orator, but the ability with which he answered point after point in Gov. Hendricks's address gained for him increased favor with the people, and he was elected by a majority of 9,688. While he held this office the civil war began, and in 1862 he assisted in raising the 70th Indiana regiment, in which he was made 2d lieutenant. When the regiment was completed, Gov. Oliver P. Morton appointed him colonel, and it was hurried forward to join the army under Gen. Don Carlos Buell at Bowling Green, Ky., then opposed by the Confederate forces under Gen. Braxton Bragg. His first independent action was as commander of an expedition sent against a body of Confederate soldiers stationed at Russellville. Dividing his forces, he surrounded the camp and captured all their horses and arms, besides taking a number of prisoners. The 70th Indiana was given the right of the brigade under Gen. William T. Ward, and continued so until the close of the war. Col. Harrison's command was occupied chiefly in the west, guarding railroads and in fighting guerillas. In this and similar duties he was occupied until January, 1864, when he was placed in command of his brigade, and added to the 1st division of the 11th army corps. Subsequently it was attached to the 3d division of the 20th army corps under Gen. Joseph Hooker, and made the campaign from Chattanooga to Atlanta. His first engagement of importance was that of Resaca, on 14 May, 1864, where he led his command. A few days later he took part in the capture of Cassville, and then in the actions at New Hope church and Golgotha church. He participated in the battles of Kenesaw Mountain and Peach Tree Creek, at the latter of which his gallantry so pleased Gen. Hooker that he wrote to the secretary of war "to call the attention of the department to the claims of Col. Benjamin Harrison, of the 70th Indiana volunteers, for promotion to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers." Gen. Hooker also said: "My attention was first attracted to this young officer by the superior excellence of his brigade in discipline and instruction, the result of his labor, skill, and devotion. With more foresight than I have witnessed in any officer of his experience, he seemed to act upon the principle that success depended upon the thorough preparation in discipline and esprit of his command for conflict, more than on any influence that could be exerted upon the field itself, and when collision came his command vindicated his wisdom as much as his valor. In all of the achievements of the 20th corps in that campaign (from Chattanooga to Atlanta) Col. Harrison bore a conspicuous part. At Resaca and Peach Tree creek the conduct of himself and command was especially distinguished." When Gen. Sherman reached Atlanta, Harrison was ordered to Indiana to obtain recruits, and he spent the time from September till November, 1864, in that work. Owing to the destruction of the railroads, he was unable to rejoin Gen. Sherman before the army made its march to the sea, and he was transferred to Nashville. The winter of 1864-'5 he spent with Gen. George H. Thomas in Tennessee, but in the spring he resumed command of his brigade in the 20th army corps, with which he remained until the close of the war. He then took part in the grand review in Washington, and was mustered out on 8 June, 1865. The brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers was conferred upon him, to date from 23 Jan., 1865, "for ability and manifest energy and gallantry in command of the brigade." To his men he was familiarly known as "Little Ben," and many acts of kindness to his subordinates, expressive of his sympathy with them, have been related.

Gen. Harrison returned to Indianapolis and assumed the duties of his office as reporter of the supreme court, to which he had been re-elected in 1864 by a majority of 19,913. At the expiration of his term of office he declined a renomination, and resumed his practice, which he has since followed successfully. During the presidential canvasses of 1868 and 1872 he travelled through Indiana and addressed large audiences, but did not again enter politics until 1876, when he declined the nomination for governor. Godlove S. Orth was then chosen, but during the canvass he withdrew, and Gen. Harrison reluctantly allowed his name to be used, in the hope of saving Indiana to the Republican candidate for the presidency. The work was begun too late, and, although an energetic canvass was carried on, James D. Williams was elected by a plurality of 5,084, in a total vote of 434,457; but Gen. Harrison was 2,000 stronger than his party. In 1879 President Hayes appointed him a member of the Mississippi river commission. He was chairman of the delegation from Indiana at the National convention held in Chicago in 1880, and on the ballot that nominated James A. Garfield he cast the entire vote of his state for that candidate. His own name was placed in nomination at the beginning of the convention, but, although some votes were cast in his favor, he persisted in withdrawing. He accompanied Gen. Garfield on his trip to New York, and participated in the speech-making along the route. Subsequently he was offered a place in the cabinet of President Garfield, but declined it.

The Republicans regained control of the Indiana legislature in the election of 1880, and Gen. Harrison was chosen U. S. senator, and took his seat as such on 4 March, 1881, holding it until 3 March, 1887. His career in the senate was marked by the delivery of numerous speeches on subjects of general interest. He pronounced in favor of a judicious tariff reform, advocated the rights of the working classes, opposed President Cleveland's vetoes of pension bills, advised the restoration of the American navy, and voted for civil-service reform. In 1884 he was a delegate-at-large from his state to the National Republican convention held in Chicago, and his name was again discussed in connection with the presidency. The Republican national convention of 1888 was held in Chicago in June. For some time previous he had been frequently referred to as a desirable candidate for the presidency, and on the first ballot he received 83 votes, standing fifth on the list, John Sherman standing first with 225. Seven more ballots were taken, during which Chauncey M. Depew withdrew and transferred his strength to Gen. Harrison, who then received 544 votes on the eighth and final ballot. On 4 July following he received the formal notification of his nomination, and on 11 Sept. signified his acceptance in a letter in which he said: "The tariff issue cannot now be obscured. It is not a contest between schedules, but between wide-apart principles. The foreign competitors for our market have, with quick instinct, seen how one issue of this contest may bring them advantage, and our own people are not so dull as to miss or neglect the grave interests that are involved for them. The assault upon our protective system is open and defiant. Protection is assailed as unconstitutional in law, or as vicious in principle, and those who hold such views sincerely cannot stop short of an absolute elimination from our tariff laws of the principle of protection. The Mills bill is only a step, but it is toward an object that the leaders of Democratic thought and legislation have clearly in mind. The important question is not so much the length of the step as the direction of it. Judged by the executive message of December last, by the Mills bill, by the debates in congress, and by the St. Louis platform, the Democratic party will, if supported by the country, place the tariff laws upon a purely revenue basis. This is practical free trade—free-trade in the English sense. . . . Those who teach that the import duty upon foreign goods sold in our market is paid by the consumer, and that the price of the domestic competing article is enhanced to the amount of the duty on the imported article—that every million of dollars collected for customs duties represents many millions more which do not reach the treasury, but are paid by our citizens as the increased cost of domestic productions resulting from the tariff laws—may not intend to discredit in the minds of others our system of levying duties on competing foreign products, but it is clearly already discredited in their own. We cannot doubt, without impugning their integrity, that, if free to act upon their convictions, they would so revise our laws as to lay the burden of the customs revenue upon articles that are not produced in this country, and to place upon the free list all competing foreign products. I do not stop to refute this theory as to the effect of our tariff duties. Those who advance it are students of maxims and not of the markets. . . . The surplus now in the treasury should be used in the purchase of bonds. The law authorizes this use of it, and, if it is not needed for current or deficiency appropriations, the people, and not the banks in which it has been deposited, should have the advantage of its use by stopping interest upon the public debt. . . . The law regulating appointments to the classified civil service received my support in the senate, in the belief that it opened the way to a much-needed reform. I still think so, and therefore cordially approve the clear and forcible expression of the convention upon this subject. The law should have the aid of a friendly interpretation, and be faithfully and vigorously enforced. All appointments under it should be absolutely free from partisan considerations and influence." The election resulted in Mr. Harrison's favor, who received 233 votes in the Electoral college, against 168 for Grover Cleveland. The above engraving is a view of his home in Indianapolis. His life has been written by Gen. Lewis Wallace (Philadelphia, 1888).—His wife, Caroline Lavinia Scott, b. in Oxford, Ohio, 1 Oct., 1832, is the daughter of John W. Scott, who was a professor in Miami university at the time of her birth, and afterward became president of the seminary in Oxford. She was graduated at the seminary in 1852, the same year that Gen. Harrison took his degree at the university, and was married to him on 20 Oct., 1853. She is a musician, and is also devoted to painting, besides which she is a diligent reader, giving part of her time to literary clubs, of several of which she is a member. Mrs. Harrison is a manager of the orphan asylum in Indianapolis and a member of the Presbyterian church in that city, and until her removal to Washington taught a class in Sunday-school. They have two children. The son, Russell, was graduated at Lafayette in 1877 as a mining engineer, and, in addition to other engineering work, has been connected with the U. S. mints at New Orleans and Helena as assayer. He is now a resident of Montana, where he has a cattle-ranch, and is also engaged in journalism. The daughter, Mary, married Robert J. McKee, a merchant of Indianapolis.

HARTLEY, Robert Milham, philanthropist, b. in Cockermouth, England, 17 Feb., 1796; d. in New York city, 3 March, 1881. He was a nephew of David Hartley (vol. iii., p. 104). He came to this country in infancy and became a merchant in New York city, but in 1829 he founded the New York city temperance society, and in 1833-'42 held its secretaryship. In 1842 he originated the New York association for improving the condition of the poor, remaining with it thirty-five years, and issuing 34 octavo volumes of reports. Various charitable institutions in New York had their origin in him. Besides numerous contributions to the press, he published "Historical, Scientific, and Practical Essay on Milk" (New York, 1841), and "Intemperance in Cities and Large Towns" (1851).—His son, Isaac Smithson, clergyman, b. in New York city, 27 Sept., 1830, was graduated at New York university in 1852 and at Andover theological seminary in 1856, and after extensive travels became pastor of the Union Reformed Dutch church, New York city, in 1863. Seven years later he removed to Philadelphia to become a pastor in that city, and in 1871 he accepted the pastorate of the Reformed church at Utica, N. Y. He received in 1873 from Rutgers the degree of D. D., and the same year founded at that college the Vedder lectureship on modern infidelity, and published under its auspices "Prayer and its Relation to Modern Thought and Criticism" (New York, 1874). His other works are "History of the Reformed Church, Utica, N. Y." (1880); "Memorial of Rev. Philip H. Fowler, D. D." (New York, 1881); "Memorial of Robert Milham Hartley" (Utica, 1881); "Old Fort Schuyler in History" (1884); and "The Twelve Gates," poems (Utica, 1887).

HASKELL, James Richards, inventor, b. in Geneva, N. Y., 17 Sept., 1825. He was educated at Richfield (Ohio) academy, and at the preparatory department of Western Reserve college. He was assistant postmaster of Cleveland, Ohio, in 1849-'53, and then engaged unsuccessfully in business in New York. In 1854 he began a series of experiments with steel breech-loading rifled cannon and breech-loading small-arms, manufacturing twenty-five of the former, which were purchased by the Mexican government, and were the first of the description that were made in the United States. In 1855 he began experimenting with multicharge guns in association with Azel S. Lyman, who first conceived the idea of applying successive charges of powder to accelerate the velocity of a projectile. In 1885 congress appropriated funds in order to test these guns, but the bureau of ordnance opposed such action. Mr. Haskell's experiments have cost more than $300,000, and the system is now completed, so that the power of these guns is more than doubled, and at the same time the maximum pressure used is less than that in other guns. In 1862, with Rafael Rafael, he invented and constructed a machine gun for very rapid firing, but, notwithstanding a favorable report on it by a board of army officers, the authorities refused to adopt it. Mr. Haskell is a member of the American association for the advancement of science, and has written several pamphlets on national armament and on ordnance problems.

HENDRIX, Eugene Russell, M. E. bishop, b. in Fayette, Mo., 17 May, 1847. He was graduated at Wesleyan in 1867, and at Union theological seminary, New York, in 1869, and after holding several pastorates in the Methodist church, south, became in 1878 president of Central college, Fayette, Mo. In 1886 he was made a bishop. In 1878 he received the degree of D. D. from Emory college, Ga. Dr. Hendrix declined the vice-chancellorship of Vanderbilt university in 1885, and also the presidency of the University of Missouri. Bishop Hendrix was chairman of the committee to arrange for the centennial celebration of organized American Methodism in behalf of the church, south, when $2,000,000 were raised as a thank-offering. He was a delegate to the oecumenical conference in London in 1881 and to the centennial conference in Baltimore in 1884, and a member of the general conferences of 1882 and 1886. He made a missionary tour of the world in 1876-'7 with Bishop Marvin, of St. Louis, and on his return published "Around the World" (Nashville, Tenn., 1878). In 1876-'8 he was an editor of the St. Louis "Christian Advocate."

HENNESSY, John Joseph, R. C. bishop, b. near Cloyne, County Cork, Ireland, 19 July, 1847. He came to the United States in his youth, was graduated at the College of the Christian Brothers, St. Louis, Mo., in 1862, and pursued theological studies in the Seminary of St. Francis de Sales, Milwaukee, Wis. After his ordination he was rector of Iron Mountain, Mo., in 1870-'80, and then of the cathedral of St. Louis. He was appointed bishop of Wichita, Kan., on 28 Aug., 1888, and consecrated on 30 Nov.

HERBERT OF LEA, Elizabeth, Baroness, philanthropist, b. in England about 1825. She is the only daughter of Lieut.-Gen. Charles Ashe A'Court, and niece of Lord Heytesbury, and on 12 Aug., 1846, married Sidney Herbert, second son of the 11th Earl of Pembroke. Her husband was created Baron Herbert of Lea, 15 Jan., 1861, held for some time the secretaryship of state for war, and died, 2 Aug., 1861. His elder brother died childless, and Lady Herbert's eldest son, George Robert Charles, succeeded to the earldom of Pembroke in 1862. Lady Herbert has passed many years in the West Indies in philanthropic labors among the negroes, and came to this country in 1888 to work among the colored people of the south, seeking their conversion to Roman Catholicism. She purposes to erect an orphanage in Baltimore.—Her son, MICHEL HENRY, b. 25 June, 1857, as attaché of the British legation at Washington, became acting minister in November, 1888, on the dismissal of Lord Sackville, and on the 27th of that month married an American.

HILLERN, Bertha von, artist, b. in Treves, Germany, 4 Aug., 1857. She came to this country in 1877, and for two years devoted her time to advocating athletic exercises for women, appearing in public as a pedestrian. She then devoted herself to the study of art, which she has since pursued as a profession in Boston. Among her pictures are "The Monk Felix," from Longfellow's "Golden Legend"; "Evening Prayer at the Wayside Shrine, Germany" (1883); "The Conversion of the Heathen General, Placidus, by a Miracle while Hunting" (1885); "Live-Oak Forest in the Ojai Valley, California" (1887); "St. Paul, the first Hermit," and "A Walk through the Pine Barrens, Florida" (1888). In 1888 she exhibited a large number of landscapes in Boston. She has also devoted much time to writing for the press on hygienic subjects, and is preparing for publication a work on "Physical Culture."

HINTENACH, Andrew, R. C. prelate, b. in Schollbrunn, Baden, Germany, 12 May, 1844. He entered St. Vincent's college, Westmoreland co., Pa., in August, 1854, joined the Benedictine order, 11 July, 1861, and was ordained priest on 12 April, 1867. Since then he has been occupied successively as professor in the college, master of novices, and prior of the monastery until 7 Feb., 1888, when he was chosen abbot of St. Vincent's abbey.

HOFFMAN, Eugene Augustus, clergyman, b. in New York city, 21 March, 1829. He was graduated at Harvard in 1848, and from the General theological seminary in 1851, and was ordained a priest in the Protestant Episcopal church. In 1851-'3 he was engaged in missionary work in Elizabethport, N. J., and then was called to Christ church in Elizabeth, N. J., where he continued for ten years, after which he had St. Mary's church in Burlington, N. J., until 1864. During these years he built Christ church and rectory in Elizabeth, St. Stephen's church in Milburn, and Trinity church in Woodbridge, N. J. He was rector of Grace church on Brooklyn heights in 1864-'9, and of St. Mark's church, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1869-'79. He then became dean of the General theological seminary in New York city, which post he still holds. In connection with his father, Samuel Verplanck Hoffman, he endowed the chair of pastoral theology with $80,000, and on the death of the former his mother contributed $125,000 for the building of the Chapel of the Good Shepherd as a memorial to her husband, and for other purposes she contributed generously during her lifetime to the support of the seminary. The deanery is the gift of Dr. Hoffman himself, who, in 1864, received the degree of D. D. from Rutgers, and from Racine in 1882. He is the author of "Free Churches," "The Eucharistic Week," and other works.—His brother, Charles Frederick, clergyman, b. in New York city, 18 Nov., 1834, was graduated at Trinity in 1851, and was subsequently ordained to priest's orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. In 1872 he was called to All Angels' church in New York city. In 1881 he received the degree of S. T. D. from Rutgers, and has given largely to the support of the General theological seminary. Dr. Hoffman, in December, 1888, agreed to erect a new church for his parish, on the west side of Central Park, at a cost of not less than $100,000.

HORTON, Samuel Dana, publicist, b. in Pomeroy, Ohio, 16 Jan., 1844. He is the son of Valentine B. Horton (vol. iii., p. 266). He was graduated at Harvard in 1864 and at the law-school in 1868, studied in Berlin university in 1869-'70, and was admitted to the bar of Ohio in 1871. He published in 1876 a treatise on "Silver and Gold and their Relation to the Problem of Resumption," the first of a series of works advocating a settlement of the silver question by joint action of nations. This policy was adopted by congress, and he has been identified with its advancement in Europe as delegate to the international monetary conferences of 1878 and 1881, and as an author. The most important of his later works is "The Silver Pound and England's Monetary Policy since the Restoration" (London, 1877).

HOWARTH, Ellen Clementine, poet, b. in Cooperstown, N. Y., 20 May, 1827. Her maiden name was Doran. She left school at seven years of age to work in a factory, married Joseph Howarth in 1846, and has since resided in Trenton, N. J. Mrs. Howarth has published "The Wind-Harp, and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1864), and "Poems," with an introduction by Richard Watson Gilder (Newark, N. J., 1868). Her best-known poem is "Thou wilt never grow Old."

HUMBOLDT, Friedrich Heinrich Alexander von, German naturalist, b. in Berlin, 14 Sept., 1769; d. there, 6 May, 1859. He studied at the universities of Frankfurt and Göttingen, and the mining academy at Freiberg, and from 1794 till 1799 was engaged in scientific research, writing, and travel. In 1799 he went to Spain and procured from the king permission to visit and make scientific investigations in all the Spanish possessions in Europe, America, and the East Indies. Such extensive privileges had never before been granted to any traveller. His exploration of Orinoco river was the first that furnished any positive knowledge of the long-disputed bifurcation of that stream. In 1802, in exploring the volcanoes of Ecuador, he ascended heights that had not previously been attained, and on Chimborazo reached the altitude of 19,286 feet. Afterward he made a profile of Mexico from sea to sea, the first that was ever given of any entire country. Humboldt then went to Havana, and after two months' residence there completed the materials for his "Essai politique sur l'île de Cuba" (Paris, 1826). He embarked thence for Philadelphia, was received with cordiality by President Jefferson, and, leaving this country, landed at Bordeaux, 3 Aug., 1804, having spent five years in America, and gained a larger store of observations and collections in all departments of natural science, geography, statistics, and ethnography than all previous travellers. His subsequent life was devoted to the prosecution of scientific research and discovery. His journey in South America is an important event in the history of that country. With his own hands he made the map of the Orinoco and the Magdalena, and the greater part of the atlas of Mexico. He travelled with the barometer in his hands from Bogota to Lima, and made 459 measurements of altitudes, which were often confirmed by trigonometrical calculations. His works include "Ansichten der Natur," a general sketch of the results of his inquiries in America (Stuttgart, 1808), and "Kosmos" (5 vols., 1845-'62). Many biographies of him have been published, the best being "Alexander von Humboldt, eine wissenschaftliche Biographie," edited by Karl Bruhns (3 vols., Leipzig, 1872; English translation by Jane and Caroline Lassells, 2 vols., London, 1872). His most important works relating to America are "Voyage aux régions équinoxiales du nouveau continent dans les années 1799 à 1804" (Paris, 1807-'16), and "Essai politique sur le royaume de la Nouvelle Espagne" (Paris, 1811).

IZARD, George, soldier, b. in London, England, 21 Oct., 1776; d. in Little Rock, Ark., 22 Oct., 1828. He was a son of Ralph Izard (vol. iii., p. 372). He came to this country, and, after residing with his family in Charleston, graduated at the College of Philadelphia (now University of Pennsylvania) in 1792, was sent by his father to a military school near London and then to one at Marburg in Hesse-Cassel. Subsequently, through the agency of James Monroe, he spent two years in the French government school for engineers of the army at Metz. While there he was commissioned lieutenant in the U. S. corps of artilleryists and engineers. Returning, he was ordered to Charleston as engineer of Fort Pinckney, then served as aide-de-camp to Alexander Hamilton during the threat of the French war, and was then allowed to accept the place of secretary of legation at Lisbon. In 1803 he resigned from the army on account of the secretary's having assigned him to the artillery instead of the engineers in the reduction of the army under Jefferson. Early in 1812 he was appointed colonel of the 2d artillery, and commanded the Department of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware. In February, 1813, he commanded District No. 3, with New York as headquarters, and was promoted brigadier-general. In August of that year, the English fleet having left the vicinity of New York, he was ordered to command one of the brigades under Gen. Wade Hampton, holding the line of Chateaugay river near Lake Champlain. In Hampton's defeat of 26 Oct. he handled his brigade with ability, and conducted the retreat in an orderly manner. He was promoted major-general in March, 1814, and on 4 May took command of the division of the right with headquarters at Plattsburg. There he found only 2,000 badly-equipped and half-disciplined men, which number was increased by August to 7,000, all raw recruits. Izard was unremitting in their instruction and active in fortifying the post. The arrivals on the British side in the mean time amounted to more than 30,000 men, all regulars, and mainly Wellington's veterans. Late in August he was ordered to Sackett's Harbor and Niagara with 4,000 men, leaving Plattsburg in condition successfully to resist Prevost's attack. After an arduous march of 400 miles over bad roads he marshalled his troops, with those of General Jacob Brown, on the Canada side of Niagara river, and found the

was that he outnumbered the enemy but by a few hundred men. He offered battle in the open, but it was declined, and, being deficient in artillery, and winter weather being at hand, he decided not to attempt to turn Drummond's position. His entire evacuation of the peninsula, including the destruction of Fort Erie, which followed, was approved by the president and secretary of war. Gen. Izard was the only officer of the war of 1812 who had been completely educated in the schools. The war was undertaken without an adequate military establishment, and when, after repeated disasters, an officer with a complete education and good record was placed in command, he was paralyzed in his efforts by the overwhelming odds against him. Izard's military judgment seems to have been correct, and in reading the severe strictures against him by Ingersoll and Armstrong, not only the conditions surrounding him should be taken into account, but the competency of his judges as military critics should also be considered. Gen. Izard resigned from the army in January, 1815, and was appointed governor of Arkansas in 1825.

JACKSON, Richard Henry, soldier, b. in Ireland, 14 July, 1830. He was educated in Dublin, came to this country in early life, enlisted in the U. S. army in 1851, and became 1st sergeant in the 4th artillery. After serving in Florida and the west, he passed his examination for a 2d lieutenancy, receiving his commission, 13 Sept., 1859. He was promoted to 1st lieutenant, 14 May, 1861, commanded a company at Fort Pickens, Fla., during its bombardments, and in the capture of Pensacola, and was made captain, 20 Feb., 1862. He afterward served as assistant inspector-general, and was also acting chief of artillery on Morris and Folly islands during the operations against Fort Sumter, and then chief of artillery of the 10th and 25th corps, Army of the James. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 1 Jan., 1865, for services in the campaign of 1864, and commanded the 2d division of the 25th corps in the operations that preceded Lee's surrender. He was commissioned full brigadier-general of volunteers, 19 May, 1865, and brevet major-general on 24 Nov. Gen. Jackson also received during the war the regular army brevets of major for Drury's Bluff, lieutenant-colonel for Newmarket Heights, and colonel and brigadier-general for services in the war. Since the war Gen. Jackson has served in various posts. He was promoted major 1 July, 1880, and is now (1889) in command of Fort Schuyler, N. Y.

JANSSEN, John, R. C. bishop, b. in Keppeln, Rhenish Prussia, 3 March, 1835. He was educated at the bishop's colleges in Gaesdonck and Münster. In 1858 he came to the United States and was ordained priest in Alton, Ill., on 19 Nov. of that year. He was then appointed pastor of the German Catholic congregation in Springfield, Ill., and also had charge of the German Catholics in the counties of Sangamon, Morgan, and Menard. In 1863-'8 he was secretary of Bishop Henry D. Juncker, and he was chancellor of the diocese of Alton from 1863 till 1870. Father Janssen was vicar-general to Bishop Peter J. Baltes in 1870-'86, and rector of St. Boniface's church, Quincy, Ill., in 1877-'9. On the death of Bishop Baltes in 1886 he was administrator of the diocese until the appointment of a new bishop. In January, 1887, the diocese of Alton was divided, and the new diocese of Belleville was erected. He was then made administrator of both dioceses, and on 28 Feb., 1888, became bishop of Belleville, being consecrated on 25 April, 1888.

JENKINS, Micah, soldier, b. on Edisto island, S. C., in 1836; d. in the Wilderness, Va., 6 May, 1864. He was graduated at South Carolina military institute in 1854, and established a private military school at Yorkville, S. C., in 1855. He was elected colonel of the 5th South Carolina regiment at the opening of the civil war and reorganized it at the end of its year's enlistment as Jenkins's palmetto sharpshooters. He led a brigade in the seven days' battles around Richmond, and, after Gaines's Mills and Frazer's Farm, brought out his sharpshooters, originally numbering more than 1,000, with but 125 men, his personal aide having been shot at his side, and his hat and clothing pierced by seventeen bullets. He was promoted to brigadier-general, and was present at the second battle of Bull Run, where he was severely wounded and where two of his colonels and his adjutant-general were killed. In the spring of 1863 he led a corps of observation on the Blackwater, near Richmond and Petersburg. In September following he went to Georgia with Longstreet, but was too late for the battle of Chickamauga. He then commanded Horn's division and accompanied Longstreet to Tennessee. He moved thence in the spring to Virginia, where he met his death, from his own men by mistake at night, on the second day of Grant's advance through the Wilderness.

JENNINGS, Francis, hymnologist, b. at Melksham, Wiltshire, England, 3 Nov., 1808. His father, William, was in the cloth trade, and afterward in the British army. Until Francis was seven years old he attended "a dame's school," and he was then put to work in a cloth-factory and a rope-yard. At last he was employed by a physician and learned to write. In 1842 he came to the United States and settled in Philadelphia. He has become one of the most thorough hymnologists in America. In 1871 the "Baptist Hymn-Book" was published, and he prepared for it a biographical index, giving the names, dates of birth, and death of the authors and their birthplaces, and also the time when the hymns were first printed. His first collection of hymn-books, numbering 300 volumes, belongs to the Baptist publication society; his second, of 600 volumes, he gave to the Baptist historical society. Besides numerous contributions to various papers and magazines, he wrote "Hymns, and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1864).

JOHNSTON, James Steptoe, P. E. bishop, b. in Church Hill, Jefferson co., Miss., 9 June, 1843. He was educated at the University of Virginia, left that institution to join the Confederate army, and fought through the civil war, becoming a lieutenant in Gen. James E. B. Stuart's cavalry. He was admitted to the bar in 1868, but received holy orders in the following year, taking charge of St. James' church at Port Gibson, Miss., till 1876, and then for four years of the church of the Ascension, in Mount Sterling, Ky., after which he became rector of Trinity parish, Mobile, Ala. On 28 Oct., 1887, he was elected to the office of missionary bishop of western Texas, and on 6 Jan., 1888, he was consecrated in Mobile.

JONES, Patrick Henry, lawyer, b. in Westmeath, Ireland, 20 Nov., 1830. He came to this country in 1840, attended the common schools, worked on his father's farm in Cattaraugus county, N. Y., and then read law at Ellicottville. He was admitted to the bar in May, 1856, and practised at that place till the opening of the civil war, when he entered the 37th New York regiment as 2d lieutenant, 7 June, 1861. He was promoted to adjutant and then major of that regiment, and was made colonel of the 154th New York regiment on 8 Oct., 1862. He was wounded and taken prisoner at Chancellorsville, and after his exchange in October, 1863, served in the west and in the Atlanta campaign, and on 6 June, 1864, was assigned command of a brigade, at whose head he continued until the close of the war. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 4 Dec., 1864, and on 27 June, 1865, resigned and returned to the practice of his profession at Ellicottville. In 1865 he was elected clerk of the court of appeals of the state, and at the close of his three years' term he removed to New York city. On 1 April, 1869, he was appointed postmaster of New York, and he served as such during the first presidential term of Gen. Grant, after which he resigned and resumed the practice of law in that city. In 1874 he was elected register of New York, and, after serving his term of three years, returned to his profession, in the practice of which he is still engaged.

JONES, Roger, soldier, b. in Washington, D. C., 25 Feb., 1831. He is a son of Gen. Roger Jones (vol. iii., p. 470). He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1851, served on the Texas frontier and in New Mexico, and at the beginning of the civil war was on duty at Harper's Ferry, where he destroyed the arsenal with 20,000 stand of arms, when it was seized by Virginia state troops on 18 April, 1861—for which act, done in the face of the enemy, he received the thanks of the government. He was appointed captain and assistant quartermaster on 22 April, and as such served in the office of the quartermaster-general of the Army of the Potomac, and on 12 Nov. was made a major on the staff and assigned to special duty as assistant inspector-general. He was attached to Gen. John Pope's staff for two months in 1862, when he was relieved, and was awaiting orders and on miscellaneous duty till December, 1865. From 1866 till 1876 he served as inspector-general of the Division of the Pacific. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel on 13 June, 1867, assigned to duty in the inspector-general's office at Washington on 15 Jan., 1877, became a colonel on 5 Feb., 1885, afterward acted as inspector-general of the Division of the Atlantic on Governor's island, and in August, 1888, was made brigadier-general and inspector-general of the army.

JONES, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Bettws parish, Glamorganshire, South Wales, 14 Jan., 1735; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Feb., 1814. He was a son of Rev. Thomas Jones, who brought him to Philadelphia, 22 July, 1737. In 1738 Thomas, with a small colony of Welsh Baptists, founded the Tulpohocken Baptist church, Berks county, where he labored for many years. Samuel was graduated at the College of Philadelphia in 1762, and was ordained as a Baptist minister, 8 Jan., 1763. He became pastor of the Southampton and Pennepek (now Lower Dublin) churches, but in 1770 devoted his whole time to Pennepek, where he remained until his death in 1814. For many years he also conducted an academy. In 1769 Brown conferred on him the degree of A. M., and in 1786 that of D. D., which latter was also granted him in 1788 by the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Jones was one of the most active members of the Philadelphia Baptist association, and when it was incorporated in 1797 he was chosen president of the board of trustees, remaining so during his life. He was the author of "The Doctrine of the Covenants" (Philadelphia, 1783); "A Treatise on Church Discipline" (1797); "A Selection of Psalms and Hymns" (Burlington, N. J., 1800); "A Brief History of the Imposition of Hands on Baptized Persons" (Philadelphia, 1804); and "A Century Sermon before the Philadelphia Baptist Association" (1807).

JONES, Sibyl, Quaker preacher, b. in Brunswick, Me., in 1808; d. near Augusta, Me., 4 Dec., 1873. Her early life was spent in Augusta, and for eight years she taught in public schools. Her maiden name was Jones, and in 1833 she married Eli Jones. During 1845-'6 she visited, with her husband, all the yearly meetings of Friends in the United States, and made three journeys to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. They visited Liberia in 1851, Ireland in 1852, and subsequently Norway, Sweden, and the continent of Europe, returning to this country in 1854. During the civil war she preached to nearly 30,000 soldiers in hospitals, and in 1867 she embarked on her last missionary voyage, visiting Europe, Egypt, and Syria, and presenting Christianity from the Quaker standpoint to Mohammedan women. Her travels in the East are set forth in "Eastern Sketches" by Ellen Clare Miller, her companion (Edinburgh, 1872).

KAVANAUGH, Hubbard Hinde, M. E. bishop, b. in Clarke county, Ky., 14 Jan., 1802; d. in Columbus, Miss., 19 March, 1884. He was apprenticed to the printing trade, but was licensed to preach in 1822, settled in Augusta, Ky., where he edited the "Western Watchman," and was appointed in 1823 on the Little Sandy circuit, afterward holding various charges. On the establishment of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, he adhered to that branch, and was appointed presiding elder of the Lexington district. In 1854 the general conference chose him bishop. He was corresponding editor of the "Methodist Expositor and True Issue," and was a delegate to the general conferences of his church, over several of which he presided. See "Life and Times of Bishop Kavanaugh," by A. H. Redford (Nashville, 1884).—His brother, Benjamin Taylor, clergyman, b. in Jefferson county, 28 April, 1805; d. in Boonsborough, Ky., 3 July, 1888, also entered the ministry, and from 1839 till 1842 had charge of the Indian mission at the head of Mississippi river. He afterward studied medicine and practised in St. Louis, where he also held a chair in the medical department of the University of Missouri. In 1857 he resumed his ministerial duties, and during the civil war served as chaplain and assistant surgeon in the Confederate army. After the war he was professor of intellectual and moral science in Soule university for some time, but in 1881 returned to Kentucky. He has published "Electricity the Motor Power of the Solar System" (New York, 1886), and had ready for publication "The Great Central Valley of North America" and "Notes of a Western Rambler."

KEPHART, Ezekiel Boring, bishop of the United Brethren in Christ, b. in Decatur, Pa., 6 Nov., 1834. He was licensed to preach in 1857, entered the ministry in 1859, and became principal of Michigan collegiate institute, Leonti, Mich., in 1865, in which year he was graduated at Otterbein university, Ohio. He accepted a pastorate in Pennsylvania in 1866, became president of Western college, Iowa, in 1868, and in 1881 was raised to the episcopate. Otterbein university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1881. Bishop Kephart served in the state senate of Iowa in 1871-'5.

KINZIE, John Harris, pioneer, b. in Sandwich, Canada, 7 July, 1803; d. on the Pittsburg and Fort Wayne railroad, 21 June, 1865. He is the son of John Kinzie (vol. iii., p. 552), removed with his father to Chicago, Ill., in 1803, and in 1816 settled in Detroit, Mich. He became employed in the employ of the American fur company in 1818, was proficient in many Indian languages, and in 1829 was government agent for all the north-western Indians. He returned to Chicago in 1834, was first president of the village, register of public lands in 1841, and receiver of public money in 1849. He was made paymaster in the U. S. army in 1861, and in 1865 was brevetted lieutenant-colonel. Col. Kinzie was the first president of the Chicago historical society, and built the first Episcopal church in that city.—His wife, Juliette Augusta, author, b. in Middletown, Conn., 11 Sept., 1806; d. in Amagansett, Long Island, N. Y., 15 Sept., 1870, was the daughter of Arthur W. Magill. She married Mr. Kinzie in 1830, accompanied him to Fort Winnebago, Wis., and subsequently to Chicago. She was the author of "Wau-bun, or the Early Day in the Northwest," a history of Chicago (New York, 1856), and two posthumous novels, entitled "Walter Ogilby" (Philadelphia, 1869) and "Mark Logan" (1876).

KNIGHT, Cyrus Frederic, P. E. bishop, b. in Marblehead, Mass., 28 March, 1831. He studied at Burlington college, N. J., and at Harvard, and was graduated at the General theological seminary, New York city, in 1854. After being ordained a priest of the Protestant Episcopal church he was rector of St. Mark's church, Boston, in 1855-'67, and later he had charge of St. James's, in Hartford, Conn., until 1877, when he was called to St. James's in Lancaster, Pa. He was elected bishop of Milwaukee on 13 Dec., 1888. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Bethany college in 1880, and that of D. C. L. by Bishop's university in 1886. He has been a delegate to the general conventions of his church from the dioceses in which he has been located, and was dean of Hartford while a resident of that city. In 1883 he was sent as deputy of the general convocation of the American church to the general synod of the Church of England in North America, sitting in Montreal. He has published occasional sermons and "Changes in the Communion Office" (New York, 1886).

LAKEY, Emily Jane, artist, b. in Quincy, N. Y., 22 June, 1837. She is the daughter of James Jackson, was educated at home, and taught in Tennessee and Ohio. She then turned her attention to painting, and exhibited her work first in Chicago, and in 1873 at the National academy of design. During 1877-'8 she studied in Paris under Émile Van Marcke. Her best-known paintings are "Leader of the Herd" (1882); "An Anxious Mother" (1882); and "Right of Way" (1886). She married Charles D. Lakey in 1864, and resides in New York city.

L'ARCHEVÊQUE, Jean de (larsh-vake), French soldier, d. near Arkansas river, 17 Aug., 1720. He was a member of La Salle's expedition of 1684, and enticed him into the ambuscade where he was murdered. In 1699 he was a soldier in Santa Fé. He became a successful trader, and is doubtless identical with a "Captain Archibèque" who was a member of the war councils of 1715 and 1720. In the latter he recommended a reconnaissance to the Arkansas river, on which he was killed, with forty-three others, by Pawnee Indians. He left four children, and a family of Archibeques is still living in New Mexico. These facts, save his connection with La Salle's murder, were unknown till 1888, when they were discovered in making searches in behalf of the Hemenway southwest-archæological expedition.

LARRABEE, William, governor of Iowa, b. in Middletown, Conn., 20 Jan., 1832. He removed to Clermont, Iowa, in 1853, and engaged in farming, manufacturing, and banking. He served in the Iowa state senate in 1868-'85, was chairman of the committee of ways and means for sixteen years, and since 1885 has been governor of the state, having been elected as a Republican.

LAWRENCE, Charles Brush, jurist, b. in Vergennes, Vt., 17 Dec., 1820; d. in Decatur, Ala., 19 April, 1833. He was the son of Judge Viele Lawrence, of Vermont, and, after studying for two years at Middlebury, was graduated in 1841 at Union. He studied law with Alphonso Taft in Cincinnati, Ohio, and entered on practice in St. Louis, Mo. Subsequently he removed to Quincy, Ill., where he formed a partnership with Archibald Williams. In 1859 he was elected judge of the 10th circuit, and in 1864 was chosen to the supreme court of Illinois, where he was chief justice for three years. Retiring from the bench in 1873, he practised law in Chicago until his death and was president of the bar. President Grant made him a member of the Louisiana commission, and the bench and bar of Illinois urged his appointment to the U. S. supreme court. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by Union in 1876. Chief-Justice Fuller said of him: "Learning, culture, and literary excellence he possessed, united with a sweetness of character which colored all his utterances and all his life. The qualities which made him eminent as a lawyer would have raised him to the highest rank in any walk of life. His works follow him and will perpetuate his memory, not as a ghost to haunt, but as a guest to cheer."

LE DUC, William Gates, soldier, b. in Wilkesville, Gallia co., Ohio, 29 March, 1823. He was graduated at Kenyon college in 1848, admitted to the bar in 1849, and settled in St. Paul, Minn. He was active in inducing emigration to Minnesota, prepared and obtained the first charter for a railroad in the territory, and organized the Wabash bridge company to build the first bridge over Mississippi river. He settled in Hastings, Minn., in 1856, and was the first in the territory to make and ship spring wheat-flour, which subsequently became one of the chief products of the state. He entered the National army in 1861 as a captain, became lieutenant-colonel and chief quartermaster, served with the Army of the Potomac till the Gettysburg campaign, and subsequently in the west. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers in 1865. He then returned to Minnesota, engaged in railroad enterprises, and was appointed commissioner of agriculture by President Hayes. During his occupation of this office he established a tea farm in South Carolina, successfully experimented in producing sugar from sorghum canes and beets, and founded what has since been enlarged as the bureau of animal industry, and a division of forestry.

LEE, Henry, economist, b. in Beverly, Mass., 4 Feb., 1782; d. in Boston, 6 Feb., 1867. For many years he carried on a very extensive trade with the East and West Indies, South America, and Europe, and became a collector of commercial and financial statistics, and a zealous student of political economy. His writings were highly esteemed in England, where he was recognized as an authority by such economists as McCulloch, Tooke, and Villiers. He arrived at conclusions entirely at variance with those advocated by the supporters of the so-called American system. He was a frequent contributor to the "Free-Trade Advocate," edited in Philadelphia by Condé Raguet, and became well known through his "Boston Report" as one of the "Committee of citizens of Boston and vicinity posed to a further increase of duties on importations" (Boston, 1827). This valuable work has passed through four editions, and is one of the most masterly vindications of the principles of free-trade that has ever appeared in print. At the Free-trade convention in Philadelphia, 30 Sept., 1831, he was associated with Albert Gallatin in preparing the memorial and statistical exposition of the effects of the tariff. In 1832 he was nominated for vice-president by South Carolina on the ticket with John Floyd, of Virginia, although he had no sympathy with nullification.—His eldest son, Henry, b. in Boston, 2 Sept., 1817, was graduated at Harvard in 1836, served on Gov. John A. Andrew's staff during the civil war, and published a pamphlet on "The Militia of the United States." He is senior member of the well-known banking-house of Lee, Higginson and Co.—Another son, Francis L., b. in Boston, 10 Dec., 1823; d. near Lake Champlain, 2 Sept., 1886, was graduated at Harvard in 1843, and in the civil war was colonel of the 44th Massachusetts regiment.

LEMMENS, John Nicholas, R. C. bishop, b. in Schimmert, province of Limburg, Holland, 3 June, 1850. He was educated in Holland and Belgium, ordained to the priesthood on 29 March, 1875, and went to labor among the Indians of Vancouver island. He was made rector of the cathedral in Victoria in 1882, chosen to represent the diocese of Vancouver island at the third plenary council of Baltimore held in 1884, and was consecrated bishop on 5 August, 1888.

LEMMON, John Gill, botanist, b. in Lima, Mich., 2 June, 1832. He served three years as a private in the 4th Michigan cavalry, participated in the famous experiences of that regiment, was captured, and spent six months in southern prisons. He taught in California, and, engaging in explorations on the Pacific coast, has made many discoveries in entomology and botany. Since 1886 he has been special agent of the California agricultural department in the division of forestry, and in 1888 he was appointed its botanist. Mr. Lemmon has discovered more than 200 botanical species. He has published "Ferns of the Pacific" (San Francisco, 1882); "Discovery of the Potato" (1884); and "Memorial of Amila Hudson Lemmon" (Oakland, Cal., 1885).—His wife, Sarah Allen Plummer, botanist, b. in New Gloucester, Me., 3 Sept., 1836, was educated at the Female college of Worcester, Mass., served as a hospital nurse during the civil war, and then studied at Cooper Union, New York city. In 1869 she removed to California, and in 1880, having married Mr. Lemmon, began the study of botany, in which she has made several discoveries. She has also painted in water-colors much of the flora of the Pacific slope, and her collection of more than eighty field sketches of flowers took the first premium at the World's exposition in New Orleans in 1884-'5. On her discovery of a new genus of plants in 1882, Dr. Asa Gray named it Plummera floribunda. Mrs. Lemmon is the author of the papers on "The Ferns of the Pacific Slope" (1882); "Silk-Culture in California" (1884); and "Marine Botany" (1886).

LEONARD, Abiel, P. E. bishop, b. in Fayette, Mo., 26 June, 1848. He is a son of Judge Abiel Leonard, and great-grandson of Rev. Abiel Leonard, who was chaplain in 1776 to Gen. George Washington. In 1870 he was graduated at Dartmouth, and in 1873 from the General theological seminary. His entire ministry has been in the west. He was pastor of Calvary church in Sedalia, Mo., for three years, and then of Trinity church in Hannibal, Mo., for four years. In 1881 he was called to Trinity church, Atchison, Kansas, where he remained till 1887, when he was elected missionary bishop of Utah and Nevada. During his residence in Kansas he was secretary of the diocesan convention, delegate to the General convention, and for four years a member of the standing committee of the diocese.

LEWIS, Abram Herbert, clergyman, b. in Scott, Cortland co., N. Y., 17 Nov., 1836. He was graduated at Milton college, Wis., in 1861, and at Alfred university, N. Y., in 1863, and was pastor of Seventh-day Baptist churches in Westerly, R. I., in 1864-'7, and New York in 1867-'8. In 1868 he became professor of church history and homiletics in Alfred university, in 1869-'72 he was general agent of the American Sabbath tract society, and in 1880 he became pastor at Plainfield, N. J. Alfred university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1881. He has edited "The Outlook and Sabbath Quarterly" since 1882, and is an editorial contributor to "The Philanthropist," and author of various leaflets in its "Social Purity Series." Dr. Lewis has published "Sabbath and Sunday" (Alfred Centre, N. Y., 1870); "Biblical Teachings concerning the Sabbath and the Sunday" (1884); "Critical History of the Sabbath and the Sunday in the Christian Church" (2 vols., 1886); "A Critical History of Sunday Legislation from 321 till 1888 A. D." (1888); and has written "A Biography of the Puritan Sunday."

LINCOLN, James Sullivan, artist, b. in Taunton, Mass., 13 May, 1811; d. in Providence, R. I., 19 Jan., 1887. At the age of fourteen he entered the service of an engraver in Providence, and afterward was admitted to a painter's studio. His early work consisted of engravings, miniatures, and landscapes; but from 1837 he devoted himself to portrait-painting, in which he was very successful. He was the first president of the Providence art club. Among his numerous portraits are those of Samuel Slater (1836); Prof. William H. Goddard (1837); Levi Lincoln, attorney-general of Massachusetts (1860), and his son, Gov. Levi Lincoln (1877); Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside (1867); Col. Robert G. Shaw, in Memorial hall, Cambridge (1882); Senator Henry B. Anthony (1883); and fourteen governors of Rhode Island, in the state-house at Providence.

LINN, William, pioneer, d. near Louisville, Ky., in March, 1781. In the winter of 1776-'7, with George Gibson, he undertook a voyage in barges from Pittsburg to New Orleans for military supplies. He joined Gen. George Rogers Clark's forces in 1778, commanding a company, and participating in the capture of Forts Kaskaskia, Cahokia, and Vincennes. On the discharge of some enlisted troops, who desired to return, they were placed in charge of Col. Linn, whom Gen. Clark instructed to take command at the Falls of Ohio, and Linn at once began the construction of a new stockade port on the Kentucky shore at what is now the foot of 12th street, Louisville. In July, 1780, Gen. Clark led two regiments of Kentucky volunteers against Chillicothe and Piqua towns, one in command of Col. Benjamin Logan, and the other of Col. Linn. Linn's station was one of the six or seven on Beargrass creek as early as 1779-'80, and was about ten miles from Louisville. In March, 1781, Col. Linn and three neighbors and comrades were suddenly slain there by a raiding band of savages from across the Ohio.

LITTLEJOHN, De Witt Clinton, legislator, b. in Bridgewater, N. Y., 7 Feb., 1818. He received a good education, entered a commercial career, and also engaged in the manufacture of flour. He was president of the village of Oswego, and after it became a city was twice elected its mayor. He has been frequently a member of the general assembly, and was its speaker in 1853-'7. During the early part of the civil war he served in the National army, and on 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. In 1863-'5 he was a member of congress, elected as a Republican.

LUDLAM, Reuben, physician, b. in Camden, N. J., 7 Oct., 1831. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1852, and after studying in Europe began practice in Chicago, where he became widely known in the homœopathic school, particularly as an ovariectomist. He has been connected with Hahnemann medical college and hospital since its organization in 1860, in which he assisted, and is now its dean and clinical professor of the surgical diseases of women. He was president of the American institute of homœopathy in 1870, president of the Chicago academy of medicine in 1873, and for ten years preceding 1887 an active member of the Illinois board of health. Dr. Ludlam has published "Clinical Lectures on Diphtheria," the first strictly medical book issued in the northwestern states (Chicago, 1863); "Clinical and Didactic Lectures on the Diseases of Women" (1871), which was translated into French by Adrien Delahaye (Paris, 1879); and "Jousset's Clinical Medicine," translated from the French, with notes and additions (Chicago, 1879).

McCLELLAN, Ely, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 Aug., 1834. He is the son of Samuel McClellan (vol. iv., p. 85). He studied at the University of Pennsylvania and at Williams, and was graduated at Jefferson medical college in 1856. Dr. McClellan entered the National army as a surgeon in 1861, and has since remained in the service. Among his writings are "Obstetrical Procedures among the Aborigines of North America" (Louisville, Ky., 1873); "Fibroid Tumors of the Uterus" (1874); "Cholera Hygiene" (1874); "Common Carriers, or the Porters of Disease" (1874); "A History of the Cholera Epidemic of 1873 in the United States" (Washington, 1875); "Battey's Operation" (Louisville, 1875); "A Note of Warning: Lessons to be Learned from Cholera Facts of the Past Year, and from Recent Cholera Literature" (1876); "On the Relation of Health Boards and other Sanitary Organizations with Civic Authorities" (Atlanta, Ga., 1876); and "A Review of Von Pettenkofer's Outbreak of Cholera among Convicts" (Louisville, 1877).

McKINLEY, William, legislator, b. in Niles, Trumbull co., Ohio, 29 Jan., 1844. He was educated at Poland (Ohio) academy, enlisted in the 23d Ohio volunteers in May, 1861, and rose to be captain and brevet-major. At the close of the war he began the study of law, was admitted to the bar in 1867, and settled at Canton, Ohio, where he has since resided. From 1869 till 1871 he was prosecuting attorney of Stark county, and since October, 1877, he has been in congress. In June, 1888, being a delegate to the Republican national convention at Chicago, Ill., he was made chairman of the platform committee, and is credited with having made the draft of the resolutions that were adopted. In congress he is an earnest advocate of a protective tariff.

MAYALL, Thomas Jefferson, inventor, b. in North Berwick, Me., 10 Aug., 1826; d. in Reading, Mass., 18 Feb., 1888. He obtained employment in a paper-mill in Roxbury, and soon began inventing, especially making improvements in machinery in the factory, and attracting the attention of his employers by devising the first rubber belt that was ever used in this country. This was followed by a model of the first cylinder printing-machine that was ever made, from which has grown the present industry of wall-paper printing, and calico printing, which previous to that invention was done on blocks. The machine made 1,000 rolls of paper a day, printed in two colors. His other inventions include a method of producing satin-faced paper, a method of vulcanizing rubber (1841), an automatic battery, a revolving cannon, bomb-shells with sharpened edges to bore through the armor of ships, a coffee-hulling machine, which he introduced into Brazil, and self-acting drawbridges for railroads. At the time of his death he was at work on an electric elevated railroad, an electric-cable railroad, and a pneumatic elevated railroad. His revolving cannon was introduced in several countries of Europe. By means of machinery, operated by steam, this gun is loaded and fired forty times a minute, with only one man in attendance, the loading, firing, and swabbing going on at the same time. He took out 200 patents in this country and 70 in England.

MENARD, Pierre, lieutenant-governor of Illinois, b. in Quebec, Canada, in 1767; d. in Kaskaskia, Ill., in 1845. He removed to Kaskaskia about 1788, and became a trader in furs and pelts with the Indians, with all of whom he sustained friendly relations. He was a U. S. district judge for many years, a member of the territorial legislature, and presiding officer of the council. On the admission of Illinois to the Union in 1818, he was chosen its first lieutenant-governor. The state constitution of that year provided that the governor and lieutenant-governor should be for thirty years a citizen of the United States, but Col. Menard having been naturalized only two years before, an article was added to the constitution providing that any citizen of the United States that had resided in Illinois two years preceding the election should be eligible to the office of lieutenant-governor. During his occupation of that post a series of laws were adopted which have to a great extent become the foundation of all subsequent legislation. His official life ended with his term in 1822, and he subsequently devoted himself to his private affairs and to charity. A statue, the gift of Charles P. Chouteau, of St. Louis, was erected to his memory at Springfield, Ill., in January, 1888.—His daughter, BERENICE, b. in 1801; d. in Kansas City, Mo., 20 Nov., 1888, was the first white woman that ever lived in Kansas City, and married in 1819 Francis F. Chouteau. She was a devout Roman Catholic, and built the first church erected in Kansas City.

MILLS, Roger Quarles, congressman, b. in Todd county, Ky., 30 March, 1832. He received a common-school education, removed to Palestine, Tex., in 1849, and studied law, supporting himself by serving as an assistant in the post-office and in the offices of the court clerks. In 1850 he was elected engrossing clerk of the Texas house of representatives, and in 1852 he was admitted to the bar, while still a minor, by special act of the legislature. He settled in the practice of his profession at Corsicana, Tex., in 1859 was elected to the legislature. In 1872 he was chosen to congress, from the state at large, as a Democrat, and since that time he has been continuously re-elected. In 1876 he opposed the creation of the electoral commission, and in 1887 canvassed the state of Texas against the adoption of a prohibition amendment to its constitution, which was defeated. In 1888 Mr. Mills introduced into the house of representatives the bill that is known by his name, reducing the duties on imports, and extending the free list. The bill passed the house on 21 July, 1888. During the presidential canvass of that year he spoke in favor of the re-election of Grover Cleveland.

MILLS, Sebastian Bach, pianist, b. at Cirencester, England, 13 March, 1839. He began to appear in concerts at an early age, and in 1856 went to Germany for study. He came to the United States in 1859 and settled as a teacher of the piano in New York, where he still (1889) resides. He has appeared in concerts in the United States and in Europe, and is one of the best known of American pianists. Among his numerous compositions are three "Tarantelles" (1863, 1865, and 1888); "Murmuring Fountain" (1865); "Polonaise" (1866); "Fairy Fingers" and "Recollections of Home" (1867); "Saltarello" (1874); and two "Études de Concert" (1880).

MITCHELL, Edward, clergyman, b. in Coleraine, Ireland, 3 Aug., 1769; d. in Ridgefield, Conn., 8 Aug., 1834. He came to this country in 1791 and settled in New York, where in 1796 he was one of the founders of the Society of United Christian Friends professing a belief in universal salvation, of which organization he continued as pastor until his death. Mr. Mitchell attracted large audiences, and exercised a wide-spread and permanent influence. He is described as a benevolent, cultivated, and genial gentleman, and as a preacher of remarkable eloquence, earnestness, and power.—His son, William, jurist, b. in New York city, 24 Feb., 1801; d. in Morristown, N. J., 6 Oct., 1886, was graduated at Columbia in 1820, standing first in his class, and after studying law was admitted to the bar in 1823, and became counsellor in chancery in 1827. In 1849 he was elected a justice of the supreme court of New York, which post he held until 1858. Under the provisions of the law then existing, he became a judge of the court of appeals in 1856, and in 1857 presiding justice of the supreme court. On retiring from the supreme court, Judge Mitchell did not retire from the bench, but by the action of the courts, and of the bar, and of suitors, in referring to him cases for hearing and decision, as a referee, he held his court regularly from day to day, and his calendar, like that of other courts, was always full. His reported opinions are marked by breadth and force of reasoning and large learning, which gave them permanent value. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by Columbia in 1863, and he was one of the vice-presidents of the Association of the bar of New York. Judge Mitchell published an edition of "Blackstone's Commentaries" with reference to American cases (New York, 1841). See sketch by Benjamin D. Silliman (printed privately, New York, 1887).

MITCHELL, John Grant, soldier, b. in Piqua, Ohio, 6 Nov., 1838. He was graduated at Kenyon college in 1859, was chosen 1st lieutenant in the 3d Ohio volunteers in 1861, and became colonel of the 113th Ohio, in March, 1863. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 12 Jan., 1865, and brevetted major-general of volunteers, to date from 13 March, for special gallantry in the battle of Bentonville, N. C., 17 March, 1865. Gen. Mitchell resigned on 3 July, 1865, and entered on the practice of law in Columbus, Ohio.

MITCHELL, Lucy Myers, archæologist, b. in Oroomiah, Persia, in 1845; d. in Berlin, Germany, 10 March, 1888. She was the daughter of Rev. Austin H. Wright, a missionary to the Nestorians. She was educated at Mount Holyoke seminary, Mass., married Samuel S. Mitchell, of New Jersey, in 1867, and passed most of her subsequent life abroad. Her interest in classical archæology began in Leipsic in 1872, where she collected material for her "History of Ancient Sculpture" (New York, 1883), in recognition of whose merits she was elected in 1884 a member of the Imperial archæological institute of Germany, sharing this distinction with only one other woman. She was preparing a work on Greek vases and Greek paintings, but died before its completion.

MOLLY, Captain, b. about 1756; d. near West Point, N. Y., about 1789. She was the wife of a cannonier, and was at Fort Clinton when it was captured by the British in October, 1777. As the enemy scaled the parapet, her husband dropped his port-fire and fled, but Molly caught it up and discharged the last gun fired by the Americans on that occasion. She was also conspicuous at the battle of Monmouth, 28 June, 1778, where she carried water from a neighboring spring to her husband while he was serving a gun. A shot killed him at his post, and Molly seized the rammer and filled his place at the gun. After the battle, covered with dirt and blood, she was presented by Gen. Nathanael Greene to Washington, who commended her bravery and made her a sergeant. On his recommendation, her name was placed upon the list of half-pay officers for life. She continued with the army, and after the war resided at Buttermilk Falls, N. Y. Mrs. Alexander Hamilton describes her as "a stout, red-haired, freckle-faced young Irish woman, with a handsome, piercing eye." She was a favorite with the army, and generally wore an artilleryman's coat over her dress, and a cocked hat. She has been erroneously called Moll Pitcher.

MONETTE, John Wesley, author, b. in Ohio, 3 April, 1803; d. in Madison parish, La., 1 March, 1851. He was graduated at the Kentucky medical college in 1822. Dr. Monette was mayor of Washington, Miss., and a member of the legislature. He was the author of a "History of the Discovery and Settlement of the Valley of the Mississippi" (2 vols., New York, 1846), and left in manuscript a work on the "Rivers of the Southwest."

MOORE, Edward Charles, silversmith, b. in New York city, 30 Aug., 1827. He learned the trade of silversmithing from his father, John C. Moore, succeeded to the business in 1854, and in 1867 transferred his silver works to Tiffany and Co., of which he has since had charge. Being a practical workman the application of steam, the introduction of machinery, such as the steam trip-hammer, the polishing and drawing of wire, and the use of gas for soldering and melting in his business, have largely been the result of his influence. The tea services that he made for Mrs. Mary J. Morgan and for Prince Demidoff are regarded as among the finest examples of repoussée silver-ware that were ever made. Through his work, more than anything else, American silver has been raised to its present high standard, and at the World's fair, held in Paris in 1867, he received a personal gold medal for his efforts. His study of leather and its application to the arts has resulted in this country's obtaining the first rank for fine leather-work. He has given attention to antique, Persian, Arabic, Roman, and other glass, and to Japanese arts in their higher branches. Mr. Moore's library and collections are among the most complete in his specialties in the United States.

O'CONOR, John Francis Xavier, clergyman, b. in New York city, 1 Aug., 1852. He was graduated at the College of St. Francis Xavier in 1872, and became a member of the Society of Jesus the same year. He went to Europe to finish his studies in 1874, and returned in 1879 to assume the duties of professor successively in West Park college, Georgetown university, and Boston college. Father O'Connor delivered lectures on cuneiform Assyrian in Boston before any school of that language had been established in the United States. In 1884 he secured a cast of the cuneiform Babylonian cylinder of Nebuchadnezzar in the New York museum, and a year later he published a work containing a fac-simile of the cylinder, its history, and the cuneiform text, with a transcription and a translation (1885). He has also published "Something to Read" (Georgetown, 1880); "Lyric and Dramatic Poetry" (Boston, 1883); "Reading and the Mind" (Woodstock, 1884; enlarged ed., 1885); "Garrucci's History of Christian Art" (1886); "Visits to Holy Places," continued in the series of the "Messenger of the Sacred Heart" (Philadelphia, 1885-'8); and "The Practice of Humility," from the Italian of Leo XIII. (New York, 1888).

PABLOS, Juan, Spanish printer, lived in the 16th century. When the first viceroy of Mexico, Antonio de Mendoza, was appointed in 1534, he carried with him a printing press and outfit, provided by the famous court printer, Juan Cromberger, of Seville, and this outfit was in charge of Juan Pablos, who for many years superintended the viceregal printing-shop, although in the title-page of the earlier books that were printed in Mexico, sometimes the name of Cromberger appears. The first book printed in the New World was a translation into Spanish of the Latin text of Ambrosio Camaldulense's "Escala espiritual para llegar al cielo, de San Juan Climaco," or "Spiritual Ladder to ascend into Heaven," which bore the imprint of Juan Pablos, Mexico, 1535. Of this work no authentic copy is in existence. The earliest Mexican book that is known to exist is a copy of Motolinia's "Doctrina Cristiana en lengua Mexicana," printed in Mexico, 1544, but bearing the imprint of Juan Cromberger. It is in the provincial library of Toledo.

PEABODY, Charles Augustus, jurist, b. in Sandwich, N. H., 10 July, 1814. He was educated privately, studied law in Baltimore, Md., and at Harvard law-school. He settled in New York city in 1839, and has since resided there. He was a member of the convention that organized the Republican party in his state in 1855, was chosen a justice of the supreme court in the same year, served till the end of 1857, and in 1858 became commissioner of quarantine. In 1862 he was appointed by President Lincoln judge of the U. S. Provisional court of Louisiana, holding office till 1865, "with authority to hear, try, and determine all causes, civil and criminal, including causes in law, equity, revenue, and admiralty, . . . his judgment to be final and conclusive." He was also sole judge of another court of unlimited criminal jurisdiction during a part of that time. In 1863 he became chief justice of the supreme court of Louisiana, and in 1865 he was appointed U. S. attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana, but declined that post, and resumed practice in New York city. Judge Peabody is one of the vice-presidents of the Association for the reform and codification of the laws of nations, and has usually attended its meetings in Europe. He was appointed by the U. S. government in 1885 a delegate in its behalf to the International congress of commercial law convoked by the king of the Belgians, that met in Antwerp, and held a similar appointment from the New York state chamber of commerce.

PEACOCK, Thomas Brower, poet, b. in Cambridge, Ohio, 16 April, 1852. He was educated in Zanesville, Ohio, and for about ten years was associate editor of the Topeka, Kan., "Democrat." He has made and patented several inventions, the most important of which is a fire-escape specially adapted to large hotels. He has published "Poems" (Kansas City, 1872); "The Vendetta, and other Poems" (Topeka, 1876); "The Rhyme of the Border War" (New York, 1880); and "Poems of the Plains and Songs of the Solitudes" (1888). The last volume reached a 3d edition in a year, and is being translated into German by Karl Knortz.

PECK, Clarissa C., philanthropist, b. in Marathon, Cortland co., N. Y., in 1817; d. in Chicago, Ill., 22 Dec., 1884. Her maiden name was Brink. She married Philander Peck in 1837 and removed to Little Rock, Ill., in the same year, to White Water, Wis., in 1841, and to Chicago in 1851. Mrs. Peck was left with a large fortune, and bequeathed $65,000 to various religious and charitable institutions, and the residue of her estate, about $535,000, to found the Chicago home for incurables.

PENROSE, William Henry, soldier, b. in Madison Barracks, Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., 10 March, 1832. His father, Capt. James W. Penrose, was an officer of the regular army. The son took an irregular two-years' course in Dickinson college and became a civil and mechanical engineer. In April, 1861, he was appointed 2d lieutenant in the 3d U. S. infantry, and, after his promotion to 1st lieutenant in May, served with the Army of the Potomac till the close of the civil war. He became colonel of the 15th New Jersey regiment in April, 1863, and thereafter had command of Philip Kearny's 1st New Jersey brigade, in the Sixth corps. At times he had charge of a division, and on 27 June, 1865, he was commissioned a brigadier-general of volunteers. During the war he won the brevets in the regular army, including that of brigadier-general. He has since had command of various posts, and on 31 May, 1883, he became major of the 12th infantry, and lieutenant-colonel of the 16th Infantry on 22 Aug., 1888. Gen. Penrose has invented several mechanical devices and a set of infantry equipments which was recommended by a board of officers.

PHELPS, George May, inventor, b. in Watervliet, N. Y., 19 March, 1820; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 18 May, 1888. He early found employment in the shop of his uncle, Jonas H. Phelps, a maker of surveying and astronomical instruments in Troy. In 1850 he had established himself in business, making various kinds of light machinery, and models. Soon afterward Mr. Phelps was chosen to manufacture the type-printing telegraph of Royal E. House; and when, a few years later, the American telegraph company was formed to operate the printing system of David E. Hughes, Mr. Phelps became the superintendent of its factory. Several important modifications of this machine were devised by him, and by gradual adaptation it became the well-known "combination printer." His most valuable invention was the motor-printer, which is now in use on the lines of the Western union telegraph company. The machinery and apparatus made by Mr. Phelps were noticeable for symmetry and gracefulness, expressing an innate sense of fitness and proportion, which was the most striking characteristic of his talent as an inventor and constructor.

PHILLIPS, George Searle, English author, b. in Northamptonshire, England, in 1818. He was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, came to this country, and was connected with the New York press. He returned to England about 1845, edited the Leeds "Times," became principal of the People's college, Huddersfield, Yorkshire, in 1846, and in 1854 was lecturer to the Yorkshire union of mechanics' institutes and literary societies. He has been an inmate of an insane asylum in New Jersey since 1873. Mr. Phillips wrote generally under the pen-name of "January Searle," and among other works published "Chapters in the History of a Life" (1849); "Life of Ebenezer Elliott" (1850); "Memoirs of William Wordsworth" (1852); "The Gypsies of the Dane's Dike" (1855); and "Chicago and her Churches" (Chicago, 1868). His pamphlet on Ralph Waldo Emerson was warmly commended by Theodore Parker.

PIERCE, Winslow Smith, pioneer, b. in Boston, Mass., 3 May, 1819; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 29 July, 1888. He was educated at Dartmouth and the Harvard medical school, settled in Illinois, and was a professor in Rock Island medical college for several years. He removed to California in 1849, and was state comptroller in 1849-'53. Dr. Pierce was one of the originators of the first line of steamships between the Isthmus of Panama and San Francisco. He declined the nomination of the Democratic party for U. S. senator in California, settled in Indiana in 1860, devoted himself largely to the coal and iron industries, and laid out and at one time owned a large part of Indianapolis. He left in manuscript a complete collection of material for a book entitled "Reminiscences of Public Men from 1828 till 1888." Both his wives were sisters of Thomas A. Hendricks.

PINSONNEAULT, Peter Adolphus, Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Montreal, Canada, in 1815; d. in Canada in 1883. He studied in the College of Montreal with the intention of becoming a lawyer, but, resolving to become a priest, went to Paris, studied theology in the College of St. Sulpice, entered the Sulpitian order, and was ordained in 1840. He exercised his ministry in Montreal, on his return, until 1856, when he was consecrated bishop of the newly erected diocese of London, Ont. He removed to Sandwich in 1859, and obtained the alteration of the name of the diocese to Sandwich. He resigned in 1867, and lived principally in Montreal, where he rendered great services to the bishop. He published a work in favor of the infallibility of the pope (1870).

POTTER, Joseph Adams, soldier, b. in Potter's Hollow, N. Y., 12 June, 1816; d. in Painesville, Ohio, 21 April, 1888. He entered the U. S. service as a civil engineer in 1835 and was engaged in building public works and making surveys of the great lakes until the beginning of the civil war. In 1861 he was ordered to Detroit, and was appointed, on 27 Sept., 1st lieutenant in the 15th U. S. infantry. He was soon transferred to the quartermaster's department, with the rank of captain, and sent to Illinois, where he was engaged in fitting out troops and in building Camp Douglass at Chicago and Camp Butler at Springfield. He disbursed millions of dollars, purchasing large amounts of supplies and great numbers of cavalry horses. Subsequently he had charge of the quartermaster's departments at various posts until 1874, when he became chief quartermaster of the Department of the Gulf, with headquarters at New Orleans. On 21 April, 1879, he was retired. He received the brevets from major to brigadier-general in the U. S. army on 13 March, 1865.

POTTS, Benjamin Franklin, soldier, b. in Carroll county, Ohio, 29 Jan., 1836; d. in Helena, Montana, 17 June, 1887. He was educated at Westminster college, New Wilmington, Pa., and admitted to the bar in 1859. He became captain in the 42d Ohio regiment in 1861, served in the Shenandoah valley, was commissioned colonel in 1862, participated in the Vicksburg campaign, and was then promoted to the command of a brigade and served under Gen. William T. Sherman. On 5 Jan., 1865, he became brigadier-general of volunteers. He then returned to the practice of law, was elected state senator of Ohio, and was governor of Montana in 1870-'83. He was in the legislature in 1884, after which he occupied no public office.

POWDERLY, Terence Vincent, general master-workman of the Knights of labor, b. in Carbon-dale, Pa., 22 Jan., 1849, of Irish Catholic parents, who had come to the United States in 1826. His father was a day laborer, and Terence was the eleventh child. He attended the public schools from his seventh to his thirteenth year. Then he began keeping a switch for the Delaware and Hudson canal company, and in 1866 he was employed as an apprentice in the machine-shops of that company. In 1869 he went to Scranton, Pa., which has since been his home. There he obtained work in the shops of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western railroad company, and at night studied drawing and mechanical engineering. In 1871 he joined the Machinists' and blacksmiths' union, of which he soon became president. His interest in industrial affairs has been the guiding principle of his life. In 1874 Mr. Powderly was initiated into the Knights of labor (an order founded in 1869 in Philadelphia by Uriah S. Stevens, of Cape May county, N. J.) and became a member of Assembly No. 88. During the panic of 1873 he lost his work at Scranton, and went to Oil City, Pa., whence he went, in 1874, as a delegate to the National convention of the Machinists' and blacksmiths' union in Louisville. This was his first national appearance as an advocate of organized labor. He finally succeeded in getting this union to disband and join the Knights of labor as Assembly No. 222. In 1877 he assisted in organizing in Lackawanna county, Pa., a district assembly of Knights of labor, of which he became and was district secretary until 1886. In the great strikes of 1877 about 5,000 laborers, mostly of the Knights of labor of that district, were discharged, and emigrated to various parts of the west. In their new homes they established new assemblies of the Knights of labor, and to this Mr. Powderly largely attributes the spread and growth of the order. He and other leaders held the first general assembly of the order at Reading, Pa., in 1878, and at the next session, held in St. Louis in 1879, he was elected to the second office, grand worthy foreman. At the third convention, held in Chicago in September, 1879, Mr. Powderly was elected general master-workman, and he has since, despite bitter opposition, been eight times re-elected to that office, which he now holds. In April, 1878, by the labor vote, he was elected mayor of Scranton, Pa., and he was several times re-elected as a Democrat to that office. He helped to establish the "Labor Advocate" at Scranton in 1877. Mr. Powderly writes regularly for the organ of the Knights of labor, the "Journal of United Labor," and has written on "The Army of the Unemployed" and kindred topics for periodicals. When the Irish land league movement was organized in this country Mr. Powderly was made its second vice-president. He went as chairman of the Pennsylvania delegation to the Irish land league convention of 1883, and called that convention to order. At present he is engaged on a "History of the Origin and Principles of the Knights of Labor."

PULESTON, Sir John Henry, banker, b. in the vale of Cluyd, Wales, in 1830. He was educated at King's college, London, where he studied medicine. This profession he soon abandoned, and came to the United States. He settled in Lucerne county, Pa., and published a paper in Pittston, which proving unsuccessful, he founded one in Phoenixville. During the civil war he was made chief of the Pennsylvania agency established in Washington by Gov. Andrew G. Curtin. He discharged the duties of this office for some time, but resigned to take charge of claims offered to him under the government. Subsequently he established himself in New York city in the banking-firm of Puleston, Raymond and Co., and later returned to London as a member of the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch and Co. He was elected to parliament from Devonport in 1874, and by re-elections has since retained that seat. In 1887 he was knighted for his long and faithful services in parliament. At present he is a member of the banking-firm of Puleston and Brown.

PURDUE, John, philanthropist, b. near Shepardsburg, Pa., 5 Oct., 1801; d. in Lafayette, Ind., 12 Sept., 1876. In his early youth he emigrated to Ohio with his parents. He received a common-school education, taught for a time, became a dry-goods merchant, settled in Lafayette, Ind., in 1839, and accumulated a fortune, also engaging in manufacturing. Mr. Purdue was owner of the Lafayette "Journal," and in 1866 was an unsuccessful independent candidate for congress. In 1869 he founded Purdue university in his adopted town, giving $150,000 toward its endowment.

RAMBAUT, Mary Lucinda Bonney, educator, b. in Hamilton, N. Y., 8 June, 1816. She founded, with Harriette A. Dillaye, the Chestnut street seminary for young ladies, in Philadelphia, in 1850, and conducted it until 1883, when it was removed to Ogontz, near Philadelphia, where she continued it for five years. In 1888 she married the Rev. Thomas Rambaut, and resides in Hamilton, N. Y. She originated the Woman's national Indian association in 1879, and was its president until 1884, when she became honorary president.

REED, Caroline Gallup, educator, b. in Berne, N. Y., 5 Aug., 1821. She is the daughter of Albert Gallup, treasurer of Albany county, and was educated at St. Peter's school and the Female academy in Albany. In 1851 she married the Rev. Sylvanus Reed, and in 1864 established a school for young ladies in New York city, which she still continues. In 1883 this very successful school was incorporated under the laws of New York state as Reed college, so that the perpetuity of the establishment might be assured. Mrs. Reed was elected a member of the American geographical society in 1860, of the American association for the advancement of science, and of the New York genealogical and biographical society in 1882. She has published various papers and has issued regularly "circulars of information" upon subjects of educational interest.

REICH, Jacques, artist, b. in Hungary, 10 Aug., 1852. He was a pupil of William Adolphe Bouguereau and Robert Fleury, studied art in Budapest, and in 1873 came to the United States, where he continued his studies at the Academy of fine arts in Philadelphia. He has devoted most of his time to drawing in black and white, and has executed numerous portraits in charcoal. In 1879

he went to Paris for the purpose of continuing his studies, and remained under the instruction of the above-mentioned masters for a year. Returning to Philadelphia, he turned his attention to drawing in pen and ink for illustrating books, and to etching. In 1885 he came to New York and made all the pen-and-ink portraits for Scribner's "Cyclopædia of Painters and Paintings," as well as numerous others for periodicals. He drew the portraits for Appletons' "Annual Cyclopædia" for 1886, 1887, and 1888. Early in June, 1886, he began to execute the sixteen hundred portraits for this work, to which task he gave almost exclusive attention till it was completed in December, 1888.

ROBERTS, George Brooke, civil engineer, b. in Montgomery county, Pa., 15 Jan., 1833. He was graduated at Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1849, and was an assistant there in mathematics and geodesy in 1850-'1. He entered the Pennsylvania railroad service as rodman in 1851, in 1852 became assistant engineer of the Philadelphia and Erie railroad, and for the next ten years was steadily engaged in the location and construction of various roads, returning to the Pennsylvania railroad in 1862, as assistant to the president. He was made fourth vice-president in 1869, then second vice-president, in 1874 first vice-president, and upon the death of Col. Thomas A. Scott, in May, 1880, he became president of the company.

ROBERTS, George Litch, lawyer, b. in Boston, Mass., 30 Dec., 1836. He was graduated at Wesleyan university, Middletown, Conn., in 1859, and began the practice of his profession in the office of Benjamin R. Curtis. He has taken a prominent part in the Bell telephone cases, and is one of the foremost patent lawyers in the United States.

ROBINSON, James Sidney, soldier, b. in Franklin township, Richland co., Ohio, 14 Oct., 1827. He was educated in the common schools, edited a newspaper in Kenton, Ohio, and was clerk of the Ohio legislature in 1856-'7. He entered the National army in 1861 as lieutenant in the 4th Ohio regiment, became major of the 82d Ohio infantry, and rose to brigadier-general of volunteers, 12 Jan., 1865. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865. He became commissioner of railroads and telegraphs in Ohio in 1879, was a member of congress in 1881-'5, having been chosen as a Republican, and since 1884 has been secretary of state of Ohio. He was chairman of the Ohio Republican executive committee in 1877-'9.

ROCKWOOD, George Gardner, photographer, b. in Troy, N. Y., 12 April, 1832. He was educated at the Balston Spa institute, became a reporter on the Troy daily "Times," and at twenty years of age was managing editor of the Troy daily "Post." He became interested in photography in 1855, was the first to make the carte de visite photograph in this country, introduced many of the chief inventions in the art, and constantly contributed to the press both upon scientific and technical subjects. Mr. Rockwood is the author of the scientific hoax, "Brain Pictures," which appeared in a New York paper in 1887.

ROGERS, Moses, pioneer steam navigator, b. in New London, Conn., in September, 1780; d. in Cheraw, S. C., 15 Sept., 1822. He was associated with Robert Fulton in his experiments, in 1808 commanded the "Clermont," and in June, 1809, with Robert L. Stevens, had charge of the "Phoenix" in her voyage from New York to Philadelphia, which was the first trip that was ever made on the ocean by a steam vessel. Subsequently he commanded the first steamer that went from Charleston to Savannah. In 1818 he was employed by Scarborough and Isaacs to purchase a hull in which he was to have built an engine in order to make a trial-trip across the Atlantic. This vessel was christened "Savannah," and he was made her captain and engineer. She left Savannah, Ga., on 28 March, 1819, and went by way of New York to Liverpool, where she arrived on 18 June, thus being the first steam vessel to cross the ocean. After his return Capt. Rogers built and commanded the "Pee Dee," plying between Georgetown, S. C., and Cheraw, S. C., until his death.

RYAN, William Thomas Carroll, Canadian author, b. in Toronto, Upper Canada, 3 Feb., 1839. He was educated in St. Michael's college, Toronto, served as a volunteer in the Crimean war when little more than a boy, was afterward in an English regiment, travelled extensively, and then became a journalist. He has written "Oscar, and other Poems" (Hamilton, Ont., 1857); "Songs of a Wanderer" (Ottawa, 1867); "Description of the Route of the Canadian Pacific" (1876); and "Picture Poems" (1884).—His wife, MARY ANN MACIVOR, is the author of "Poems" (Ottawa, 1870).

SALOMON, Louis Étienne Félicité, president of Hayti, b. in Aux Cayes in 1820; d. in Paris, France, 19 Oct., 1888. He was of pure African parentage, but of a wealthy family, and received an excellent education. In 1838 he entered the public service, and in 1843 joined the revolution against Boyer. He rose to the grade of colonel in the army, and in 1848 became minister of finance, foreign relations, instruction, and justice. After the proclamation of the empire he was created Duke de St. Louis du Sud, and he became general-in-chief in 1855. On the fall of Soulouque in 1859, Salomon went to France and later to St. Thomas, whence he participated in the revolutionary attempt of 1862, and was sentenced to death in his absence. In 1867 he was appointed by Salnave minister to England, France, and Spain, but President Nissage Saget dismissed him in 1870, forbidding his return to Hayti, and in 1873 he was again condemned to death in his absence as an instigator of the rebellion of Gonaives. He returned in 1876, and was again exiled in March 1878, but in 1879 went again to Hayti, and was elected president on 23 Oct., being chosen again in 1886 for another term of seven years. Although he was practically a dictator, his administration was beneficial to the country. Honest management of the finances was introduced, and the public credit was raised in such manner that the revenue increased and the balance due to the French government since 1825 was paid. A national exhibition was held in 1881, the country joined the Postal Union, and government bonds were steadily redeemed from the augmented revenue. Revolutionary attempts increased after his re-election, and the harsh measures that he employed to crush them, added to the general dissatisfaction, culminated in an insurrection on 4 Aug., 1888. Salomon was besieged in his palace by the rebellious garrison, and on 10 Aug. took refuge on board a British man-of-war. Thence he went to Santiago de Cuba, and by way of New York to Paris. He was a fine-looking man, six feet four inches tall, with jet-black skin and white hair.

SCOTT, William Lawrence, congressman, b. in Washington, D. C., 2 July, 1828. He is the grandson of Gustavus Scott (vol. v., p. 436). After receiving a common-school education he became a page in the U. S. house of representatives. He settled in Erie, Pa., in 1848, as a clerk in the shipping business, and in 1850 entered business for himself as a coal and shipping merchant. He subsequently became largely interested in iron manufacturing, coal-mining, and the construction and operation of railroads. He was a delegate to the Democratic national conventions in 1868 and in 1880, was elected mayor of Erie in 1866 and 1871, and was a member of the National Democratic committee in 1876-'88. By a union of Democrats and independent Republicans he was chosen to congress an independent Democrat in 1884, where he was a member of the committee of ways and means, and has since served by re-election.

SCOTTOW, Joshua, colonist, b. in England in 1615; d. in Boston, Mass., 20 Jan., 1698. He emigrated to Massachusetts with his family in 1634, became a captain of militia, and was the confidential agent of La Tour in his negotiations with the colonial government in 1654-'7. His daughter, Elizabeth, married Thomas Savage, the ancestor of James Savage the antiquarian. He published "Old Men's Fears for their Own Declensions," a vigorously written presentation of the supposed degeneracy of the author's times (Boston, 1691; reprinted 1749), and a "Narrative of the Planting of Massachusetts Colony" (1694).

SHERRED, Jacob, donor, b. in Germany, 23 Jan., 1756; d. in New York city, 30 March, 1821. He was a glazier and painter, and had an extensive business in New York city. Sherred was a vestryman of Trinity church, and a tablet to his memory has been placed in its monument-room. When it was proposed to remove the General theological seminary of the Protestant Episcopal church to New Jersey, he was induced by his wife to leave to it $60,000, provided it should locate permanently in New York. Through his efforts and those of others St. Philip's Protestant Episcopal church was built as a place of worship for colored people, and he contributed generously toward its support. He also left a large sum to the orphan asylum in New York city. In 1883 the first of the new buildings erected on Cheshire square for the Theological seminary was named Sherred hall (see vignette). The other buildings of more recent erection are Pintard hall, named after John Pintard, and Dehon hall, so called in honor of the bishop of South Carolina, through whose efforts the seminary was established.

STARLING, Lyne, philanthropist, b. in Mecklenburg county, Va., 27 Dec., 1784; d. in Columbus, Ohio, 21 Nov., 1848. He removed to Ohio in early life, was a founder of Columbus, and acquiring large wealth, devoted much of it to benevolent objects. He left a sum to establish in Columbus the Starling medical college and hospital.

STEARNS, Joseph Barker, electrical engineer, b. in Weld, Me., 28 Feb., 1831. He received a common-school education, and worked on a farm, but became a telegraph-operator, and in 1855-'67 was superintendent of the Boston fire-alarm telegraph company. During this time he made many inventions that were of value in developing the fire-alarm telegraph as it is now used in the United States. In 1868 he invented and patented the duplex system of telegraphy, which is now used throughout the world, and for which he obtained royalties from the British, French, Italian, Russian, Spanish, and Indian governments, and from the several submarine cable companies. In 1879-'80 he was employed as engineer by the Mexican telegraph company in making, laying, and putting into operation the cables of that company between Galveston, Tex., and Vera Cruz, Mexico, and in 1881 he performed a similar service for the Central and South American telegraph company, whose cables extend from the Isthmus of Tehuantepec in Mexico to Callao, Peru, in all between 4,000 and 5,000 miles. This work he completed in 1882, and he has for some years resided in Camden, Me., where his residence contains a library of 10,000 volumes, and his collection of Chiriqui pottery, which has been on exhibition at the Smithsonian institution in Washington, D. C.; and his collection of carved ivories are now on exhibition at the Metropolitan museum of art in New York city. The latter is said to be the largest collection of the kind ever made in any country.

STEUART, George H., soldier, b. in Baltimore, Md., 24 Aug., 1828. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1848, became 2d lieutenant in the 2d dragoons, 11 Nov., 1849, 1st lieutenant in the 1st cavalry, 3 March, 1855, and captain, 20 Dec., 1855. He resigned in April, 1861, and on 16 June, 1861, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 1st Maryland (Confederate) regiment. On 21 July, 1861, he was promoted its colonel, and on 18 March, 1862, he became brigadier-general. In Stonewall Jackson's advance on Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks, in May, 1862, he led the cavalry, and he afterward had charge of an infantry brigade. He was badly wounded at Cross Keys, 8 June, 1862, and his brigade suffered severely in the attack on Culp's Hill, at Gettysburg. He defended the "bloody angle" at the battle of the Wilderness against Hancock's corps, and was taken prisoner, but exchanged in the winter of 1864-'5. Since the war he has resided in Baltimore.

STURGIS, Russell, merchant, b. in Boston, Mass., 3 Aug., 1831. His father was a member of the firm of Russell and Co., Canton. The son was educated at Harvard, engaged in the China trade, and was U. S. consul at Canton, but returned to Boston, and became a merchant in that city. In 1862-'3 he served as captain and major in the 45th Massachusetts regiment. He has been actively associated with the Young men's Christian association since 1858, as president of the Boston association, chairman of the state committee, and member of the international committee, and he has published numerous religious tracts.

SULLIVAN, Alexander, lawyer, b. near Waterville, Me., 9 Aug., 1847. His parents were natives of Ireland. He acquired reputation as an orator in Michigan before he became of age. He afterward removed to Chicago, and in 1876 shot and killed Francis Hanford, the author of an anonymous letter calumniating Mr. Sullivan's wife, which had been read at a meeting of the common council. The shooting took place at an interview that Sullivan sought for the purpose of obtaining a retraction, at which not only he was assaulted by Hanford and one of the latter's friends, but his wife was also struck by Hanford when she, by chance seeing an altercation, sought appealingly to stop it. Sullivan was tried and acquitted. He was then admitted to the bar and took an honorable place in his profession. In 1883 he was chosen first president of the Irish national league of America, whose object is to promote home rule in Ireland. This place he resigned in 1884, and now devotes his entire time to his profession.—His wife, Margaret Frances (BUCHANAN), has been a leading writer for newspapers, and is a contributor to magazines. Mrs. Sullivan is literary and art editor of the Chicago "Tribune" and an editorial contributor to the press of New York. She is author of "Ireland of To-Day" (Philadelphia, 1881), and co-author with Mary E. Blake of "Mexico—Picturesque, Political, and Progressive" (Boston, 1888).

TAPPAN, Eli Todd, educator, b. in Steubenville, Ohio, 30 April, 1824. He was educated by private tutors and at St. Mary's college, Baltimore, Md., engaged in journalism, studied and practised law, and afterward taught. In 1844-'5 he was mayor of Steubenville, and he was superintendent of the public schools there in 1858-'9. He was professor of mathematics in the University of Ohio, Athens, in 1859-'60, and again in 1865-'8, and from 1868 till 1875 was president of Kenyon college, Gambier, Ohio, where he was professor of mathematics from 1875 till 1887. In that year he was appointed state commissioner of common schools of Ohio, which post he now holds. Mr. Tappan has published a "Treatise on Plane and Solid Geometry" (Cincinnati, 1867); "A Treatise on Geometry and Trigonometry" (1868); "Notes and Exercises on Surveying for the Use of Students in Kenyon College" (Mt. Vernon, 1881); and "Elements of Geometry" (New York, 1885).

THORNTON, Jessie Quinn, jurist, b. near Point Pleasant, Mason co., W. Va., 24 Aug., 1810; d. in Salem, Ore., 5 Feb., 1888. In his infancy his parents removed to Champaign county, Ohio. The son studied three years in London, read law in Staunton, Va., and was admitted to the bar in 1833. He afterward attended law lectures at the University of Virginia, in 1835 he opened an office in Palmyra, Mo., in 1836 edited a paper in the interest of Martin Van Buren, and in 1841 removed to Quincy, Ill. In 1846 he emigrated to Oregon, and early in 1847 was appointed chief justice of the provisional government. In the autumn of the same year he resigned and went to Washington, where he exerted his influence in forwarding the organization of the territorial government, and in incorporating the principal of the "Wilmot proviso" in the act that prohibited the extension of slavery into the territory. He was the author of the provision in the statutes at large that gives to the cause of public education the 16th and 36th sections of public lands in each township. In 1864-'5 he served in the legislature. At the time of the murder of Elijah P. Lovejoy, at Alton, Ill., in 1837, he commented freely on the occurrence in his paper, and a proslavery mob surrounded his building, but, after threatening death to the first man that should enter the office unbidden, he made a speech announcing his position on the slavery question and defending the right of free speech so clearly as to mollify his hearers. He published "Oregon and California in 1848" (2 vols., New York, 1849), and "History of the Provisional Government of Oregon" in the "Proceedings of the Oregon Pioneer Association" for 1875 and in the "History of the Willamette Valley."

TRACY, Benjamin Franklin, cabinet officer, b. in Owego, N. Y., 26 April, 1830. He was educated at the Owego academy, and at the age of twenty-one years was admitted to the bar in his native place. In 1853 and 1856 he was elected district attorney of Tioga county. In 1862 he was a member of the committee appointed by Gov. Edwin D. Morgan to organize recruiting for the U. S. army, and later was made colonel of the 109th New York regiment. He took part in the battles of the Wilderness and Spottsylvania, soon after which failing health compelled his return home; but he again went to the front as colonel of the 127th regiment of colored troops. Later he was placed in command of the rendezvous and prison-camp at Elmira, N. Y. At the close of the war he was made brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, and settled in Brooklyn, N. Y. On 1 Oct., 1866, he was appointed U. S. district attorney for the eastern district of New York, to which office he was reappointed on 23 Jan., 1871, serving till 1873. After returning to the practice of law, Gen. Tracy was retained as counsel for Henry Ward Beecher in the Tilton-Beecher case. On 8 Dec., 1881, to fill a vacancy, he was appointed associate judge of the court of appeals, holding this place until January, 1883. In September, 1882, he was nominated for supreme court judge by the Republicans, but was defeated on a party vote. On 5 March, 1889, he was appointed by President Harrison secretary of the navy, was confirmed on the same day by the senate, and immediately entered on the duties of the office.

WILLIAMSON, Isaiah Vansant, philanthropist, b. in Fallsington, Pa., 3 Feb., 1803; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 March, 1889. He was a farmer's son, and entered a country store at an early age. Before he attained his majority he went to Philadelphia, and there engaged in various enterprises, showing great business ability. He became a partner in the firm of Williamson, Burroughs, and Co., in the wholesale dry-goods trade, and acquired a fortune. Mr. Williamson invested his money in coal and iron lands, and became one of the largest holders of Pennsylvania railroad stock, and in the Cambria Iron Works. Believing that the degeneracy of mechanical excellence among American artisans was due to the passing away of the apprentice system, he determined to found an institution where boys could be taught carpentry, blacksmithing, printing, and other mechanical work. For this purpose in December, 1888, he placed $5,000,000 as a minimum amount in the hands of seven trustees to establish a free school of mechanical trades. Mr. Williamson's fortune was estimated at $15,000,000. He never married, and lived obscurely and almost penuriously for many years.
